When it comes to planning weddings, modern couples are fortunate to have such a wide choice of venues and vendors, with no shortage of banquet halls, caterers, entertainers and rentals of clothing and accessories. However, one decision still comes first, even before making any of these decisions: today's couples – just like every couple who came before – still needs to choose a wedding date.

Picking a date has always involved a lot of consideration, but now that many family members live out of town and both partners probably work full-time, accommodating relatives and close friends is tricky.

Jewish couples must also ensure that the date they select is permissible according to the Jewish calendar. The safest strategy is for the couple to consult their rabbi first and pencil in a few appropriate dates. Then, they can come up with a date that will suit the principals and enable them to book the venue and vendors.

"Jewish weddings may be held anywhere, but not at anytime," writes educator/author Barbara Binder Kadden in Teaching Jewish Life Cycle: Insights and Activities. For much of Jewish history, the third day of work – Tuesday – was considered an auspicious day for a wedding, based on its connection to Creation in Genesis 1:10-12.

On Shabbat, work and travel are not permitted and a new contract, like the wedding ketubah, may not be entered into. Weddings are also not held on High Holidays and major festivals. However, they can take place on Chanukah and Purim, both minor festivals.

Furthermore, weddings are not traditionally held on days of public mourning, including Tisha b'Av, the fast of Gedaliah, the 10th of Tevet, the Fast of Esther, and the 17th of Tammuz, the period between Pesach and Shavuot, and the three weeks from the 17th of Tammuz until Tisha b'Av.

One exception may be certain periods between Pesach and Shavuot during which weddings are permitted. However, it is best to speak with a rabbi to find out the exact dates. This restriction also often applies to arranging engagement and other prenuptial functions.

It is important to note that conventions vary according to Ashkenazi and Sephardi customs and ceremonies.

Jewish weddings are allowed on Rosh Chodesh, the new moon and first day of the new Hebrew month, but check with the officiating rabbi to ensure that the date is clear. Remember, your rabbi also has other commitments and must be free to provide guidance, good wishes and to officiate at the ceremony.

Although weddings may be held almost anywhere, Maurice Lamm notes in The Jewish Way in Love and Marriage that in ancient times, weddings were often held on the synagogue grounds or in the courtyard. Of course, at that time, he notes, it was also customary for the groom's father to build special quarters in the family home for the married couple – a wedding tradition today's couples will probably be thankful is no longer in effect.

Dressing boys without the headache

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Dressing your son for a party can be a headache, depending on where you decide to shop.

But it's unlikely to hurt at Crawford Boys (416-782-8137), where Paul Spear and his team specialize exclusively in boys' clothing.

Crawford Boys

"We devote 25 per cent of our floor space to husky sizes for boys," he says, referring to clothing cuts for boys who are "a little shorter and a little heavier."

"Parents have tremendous difficulty finding clothing in these cuts, because most stores carry few, if any husky sizes," he adds. "Not being able to find clothes that fit can be devastating to a guy's feelings of self-worth, but at Crawford Boys you're likely to find something that fits and makes him feel great."

The 60-year-old business carries one of the largest and most varied inventories of boys' clothing anywhere, with more stock, styles and colours than most other stores.

These days Spear is seeing a lot of second-generation clients coming into the store, and it's the service that really keeps them coming back, he says.

"We all know that when the customer walks through the door, they're the most important, whether they're buying a pair of socks or an entire wardrobe. They're the ones who keep us in business. Our service goes above and beyond the call of duty, and we receive so many compliments on our staff. I'm tremendously proud of our reputation for great service."

Knowing that men of all ages, with few exceptions, are notoriously poor clothing shoppers, he's developed a monthly newsletter for customers, proposing solutions to make the shopping experience easier.

Crawford's website also contains advice, including ground rules on fitting your son for a wardrobe.

"Avoid shopping when your son is hungry and tired," he cautions. "Do some advance scouting before you take your son with you, and don't discount his choices. If he's allowed to make his own decisions about his clothes, he will be happier and feel better about himself." For more information visit www.crawfordboysclothing.com or stop into the store at 508A Lawrence Ave. W., in Lawrence Plaza.

Beatties has been in the boys' suit business for more than 60 years, and the store has an expert on-site tailor to take care of professional alterations.

"It's very hard to find a boys' suit in Toronto," says Matt Mayr, marketing and merchandising manager for Beatties' parent company, the RHB Group.

The Eglinton Avenue store carries clothes for kids from ages five through 20, with brands such as Fred Perry, QuickSilver, Roxy, Billabong and Ben Sherman. For boys' suits, you'll find distinctive formalwear by Joseph Aboud, Elie Tahari and Calvin Klein.

"This year we've found that the bar mitzvah look is still on the traditional side. Boys are choosing traditional cuts and dark colours, like black, navy and charcoal," Mayr says. He suggests a white shirt for a morning event and a striped shirt and fancy tie for the evening.

"If your invitation calls for chic attire, we may suggest a Joseph Abboud dress pant and classy sport shirt, a look that doesn't require a jacket," he says.

Magen Boys bring the complete package

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

When it comes to a party, it's all about having an amazing time.

And one company is better equipped than anyone else to provide that.

Magen Boys Entertainment continues to grow and get better as the company caters to every kind of simchah.

"It's the full experience," said Page Magen, who, along with brother, Jian, have built up the Magen Boys brand to where it is today.

"Being the most sought-after company in Canada for providing entertainment for weddings and bar mitzvahs, we have to constantly reinvent ourselves and provide more than just entertainment."

"Uptown Loft is a creative and custom space that we've kind of created on our own," Page said.

"We identified that there was a need for spaces with more intimate settings, where clients can come in and have a great party at a great price point, and have all of the things they need at the tip of their fingers in one room."

The facility can hold up to 175 people and is as versatile as Jian and Page are themselves.

"It's a beautiful yet elegant and exquisite place for a bar mitzvah, wedding, and other events," Page said. "We have the best caterers on staff to support the place, and it's an amazing environment."

"Jian and I are well respected in this industry, and we've been all over [the continent] in the past few months," said Page, citing the Grammys, the MTV Awards and the Much-Music Video Awards (MMVA) as just a few of the big-ticket events they were part of.

Having that kind of contact list can help bring a special surprise to some events.

"The key to a great party is to customize things for the needs of the kids or the family," Page said.

"We did a bar mitzvah where the kid loved Justin Bieber, so we had Justin Bieber send him a personalized message because we're connected with him."

Just because the Magen Boys can provide everything doesn't mean that you have to spend a ton on their services.

"We're now fully in the wedding business, to the point where we have a wedding band," Page said. "We're doing weddings about as much as bar mitzvahs."

"Every day of our lives, we work for someone who is celebrating an important milestone in their lives," Page said. "We are blessed upon blessed to be part of those moments.

And because it's so important, they take their work seriously.

"We hold such a major responsibility for clients in our hands," Page said.

"We know we have to over-deliver and create that moment, and that's the biggest rush, the most fulfilling feeling you'll ever get.

"We care beyond care, and we love what we do," he added. "We understand how important it is to the family celebrating, and we will stop at nothing to make that feeling come to life."

You can find the Magen Boys online at www.magenboys.com, or reach them by phone at 905-513-6464. For inquiries about booking the Uptown Loft, e-mail info@uptownloft.com or call 416-489-1105.

Hire a videographer for your special moments

Compiled by CJN Staff

Videographers give you the ability to experience your party over and over again.

Which is why choosing the right one is very important.

Laura Weinstein (www.lauraweinstein.com; 647-880-6992) has worked as a videographer and video editor for eight years. Originally from Montreal, she has been in Toronto since 2004, when she moved here to study radio and television at Ryerson University.

Her favourite kinds of parties to film are the ones that have a lot of energy and excitement.

"I love running around with the kids and filming fun stuff with them," she says. "I'm always completely open to any idea anyone has."

She listens to what the client wants, she says, and will goes above and beyond to make their vision a reality.

"I shoot on an HD SLR camera, and I have the opportunity with different lenses to get really close crisp detailed shots. I have a range of really portable equipment so it's easy to blend in at synagogues especially," Weinstein says.

"I also have a portable dolly which allows me to get really smooth Hollywood-style sweeping camera movements. I film parties such as bar and bat mitzvahs, birthday parties from kids to adults, Purim parties, etc."

She said that what sets her apart from other production companies is that her first passion is video editing.

"I edit for work and I edit for fun. I love it. Therefore, I put a lot of effort into videos while shooting, but also in the editing room. You will never see people dancing at a rhythm that doesn't match the beat or shots that don't transition well into each other. I only deliver extremely polished videos."

Lisa Feinstein and her son, Matt, a photographer

Laura Weinstein enjoys filming parties with energy and excitement

She says editing gives her the opportunity to be very creative.

"I can also put finished videos online so you can show them to friends and family," she adds.

"Because parties can be anything from a bat mitzvah to a one-year-old's birthday, I am really open and flexible to work with different budgets and come up with prices that are fair to both parties."

She especially likes birthdays.

"I love shooting birthday parties. There's so much excitement and vibrant colours that are a pleasure to capture on film."

Lisa Feinstein (905-764-1033, lisaproductions.ca) says that content is as important as quality when recording events on video.

"It is important that a couple or bar mitzvah family hire someone who can capture the moments that are heartfelt, emotional and fun. It's also important to be unobstrusive [when capturing these moments.]"

As a mother of five children, she says she can relate to these special times and can understand the needs of her clients.

Her son, Matt, is a photographer, and when "we work together at a simchah, clients love the ease [with which we work].

Feinstein realizes that every event is different "and I make sure I do what is right for each client.

"I strive to make every family happy. I'm flexible to work within a budget."

Glittering, unforgettable kosher venues

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Still hunting for an unforgettable venue for your kosher simchah? Check out Dynamic Hospitality and Entertainment Group and Trump International Hotel and Tower.

Dynamic Hospitality and Entertainment Group offers not one but three unique locations around the city where you can feel comfortable hosting knowing that you are meeting not only the highest standards of kashrut, but also offering your guests a day or night they'll remember forever.

Atlantis (416-260-6000), formerly known as the Atlantis Pavilions, is located at Ontario Place right on Toronto's waterfront. Of this glass building raised on stilts at the edge of the lake, spokesperson Shelly Stamplecoskie says, "It's stunning at night... it's a really nice ambience for evening events."

All rooms feature glittering floor-to-ceiling windows, offering either an unobstructed view of either the water or the city skyline. Space is available for groups ranging all the way from 30 to 450, including cocktail and dance floor. With its "party vibe," says Stamplecoskie, Atlantis is very fitting for a fun event like a bar mitzvah.

The Eglinton Grand (416-485-5900), a landmark theatre located in midtown on Eglinton Avenue between Avenue Road and Bathurst Street, offers capacities for sit-down dining from 50 to 550 guests and receptions for up to 75, in an elegant, art-deco-themed location. With one ballroom, the space is exclusively yours for any event, which can also be "promoted" on the exterior marquee.

Finally, there's the newly renovated Grand Metropolitan (905-624-4009) at Dixie Road and Eglinton in Mississauga, Ont., offering two glittering ballrooms, a panoramic glass elevator, and all the glitz you'll need to offer guests an extraordinary experience. Various spaces can accommodate between 50 and 450 people.

ALL VENUES

- ☑ Kosher Available
- ☑ Kosher Kitchen at Eglinton Grand
- ☑ Wheelchair accesible

The Grand Metropolitan's Starlight Ballroom features a distinctive 19-foot chandelier with more than 40,000 crystals, which, according to marketing director Darren Bryant, "certainly creates the wow factor."

All three venues are great for any type of event, says Stamplecoskie, from birthday and anniversary parties to bar/bat mitzvahs, engagement parties, corporate events and trade shows, and – of course – weddings.

From her experience working with wedding planners organizing Jewish weddings, she says, "They are looking for something new... all three venues are unique, not your standard typical 'banquet hall,' by any means."

All offer on-site ceremony spaces. At Atlantis, there's an outdoor rooftop space available – though it can get windy, depending on weather conditions over the lake. Grand Metropolitan offers outdoor ceremonies on a brand-new 1,400-square-foot outdoor "patio oasis," while the Eglinton Grand features an indoor area upstairs for wedding ceremonies. Full bridal suites are also available at each location.

While only the Eglinton Grand has an on-site kosher kitchen, don't let that stop you. "Because we have a working, ongoing relationship with Zuchter Berk, clients have the peace of mind that comes with a kosher caterer who's very familiar with all three properties... how the properties work. You're not having a caterer come in working in the space who isn't really familiar with the territory."

Working exclusively with Zuchter Berk catering means the mashgiach and cooking staff are very familiar with the setup and can kosher the kitchen and bring in rented dishes to ensure a seamless simchah in every way.

Nine stories up in one of the city's most distinctive new buildings are the ballrooms and event spaces of Toronto's brand-new Trump International Hotel & Tower (416-637-5000, http://trumptoronto.ca), the city's latest venue to make all your kosher event fantasies come true.

The Eglinton Grand

Since Trump Toronto opened on Jan. 31, the spaces have been booked pretty much solidly, hosting everything from weddings and bar mitzvahs to corporate events in a fully equipped, state-of-the-art facility that glitters with breathtaking floor-to-ceiling city views. "It's opulent without being over-the-top," says spokesperson Naomi Strasser.

No expense was spared in creating the luxe space, with coffered ceilings, crown mouldings and a dramatic formal staircase that makes any bride's entrance heart-stoppingly memorable. The second international property in the Trump Hotels chain, nothing here was prefabricated: finishings and fixtures were imported from all over the world to create gleamingly sophisticated accents in granite, marble, metal, glass, draperies and the Trump family favourite – authentic Czech crystal.

The workmanship doesn't stop at the kitchen door – a fully equipped kosher kitchen hosts two exclusive caterers, Zuchter Berk and PR Creative Caterers, ready to serve the community's needs. "It's designed to be the most sophisticated kosher kitchen you could find," says Strasser. "Everything is completely dedicated to kosher needs. It is totally self-contained." Entire meals can be prepared on-site, including pastry, for the freshest, most delicious dining to match the city's newest exclusive venue.

With space for 150 guests seated, and additional areas outside the ballrooms for standup cocktails, plus ample bridal suites and amenities such as an on-site spa, Trump Hotel & Tower has truly thought of everything you and your party will need on the day of your event.

Gift ideas

This summer, as party season kicks into full swing, chances are you'll be looking for that perfect gift. One popular option is a gift certificate to Mirvish Productions, which owns and operates the Royal Alexandra Theatre, the Princess of Wales Theatre, the Ed Mirvish Theatre and the Panasonic Theatre.

Summer productions include BackBeat, a musical about the origins of the Beatles, and War Horse, an all-Canadian production set in the battlefields of the First World War. BackBeat debuts July 21 at the Royal Alexandra Theatre and runs until Labour Day, while War Horse continues its run at The Princess of Wales Theatre. Wednesday matinee tickets start at $25, and evening performance tickets at $35. Gift certificates are available in any denomination and can be purchased in person at the box office or by calling 416-872-1212. For more information, visit www.mirvish.com.

Korry's Clothiers

Korry's offers clothing geared to a range of budgets. For people beginning their careers, Korman recommends the Roberto line of clothing, his private label. The line includes suits, shirts, ties, pants and sport coats, all made in Canada.

"Roberto is good value. It's not made offshore. The product performs when the person starts out in their career."

Korry's also carries prestigious lines from European companies such as Canali and Hugo Boss, as well as from the Canadian company Coppley, which is based in Hamilton, Ont.

He said Korry's generates excitement by holding Canali seasonal trunk shows. All of Korry's customers are invited. "Our events are like bar mitzvahs. We feed people. We give them whatever they want to drink.

"Our events are catered by Encore Foods with Elegance"

No matter what price point his customers choose, Korman made it clear that all the suits must be adjusted by one of his on-site tailors. "If a suit is not fitted by a tailor, people are wasting their money."

Every suit needs some kind of adjustment, he explained. "Sometimes it's a low shoulder or a low arm that must be fixed.

"Great tailoring for our customers is done on the spot. We try as hard as we can to make every suit look right."

And sometimes it takes a couple of fittings, which is a reflection of good service, Korman said.

"To survive you have to be service oriented. That's how we built our business."

Yad Vashem vandalized

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

At least 10 slogans were found Monday morning on the walls outside the museum, including: "Hitler, thank you for the Holocaust," "If Hitler did not exist, the Zionists would have invented him" and "Zionists! You declared war on Hitler in the name of the Jewish people, you brought upon the Holocaust."

Some of the slogans were signed with the words, "The World Zionist Judaism."

Jerusalem police suspect that those responsible for the graffiti are anti-Zionist haredi Jews, as was the case with the vandalism that was found at the city's Ammunition Hill memorial site earlier this year.

The slogans at Yad Vashem were written primarily in and around Warsaw Ghetto Square and the Deportees Memorial.

"I am shocked and horrified by this blatant act of hatred of Israel and Zionism," said Yad Vashem chair Avner Shalev, himself a Holocaust survivor. "This is a disconcerting act that crosses the line."

Israeli police were investigating security footage from Yad Vashem's cameras seeking clues to who perpetrated the crime.

Education Minister Gideon Sa'ar also expressed horror and dismay at the antisemitic vandalism.

"Whoever desecrated and tarnished Yad Vashem with these disturbed slogans did it in order to issue a blow to the emotions of the public," Sa'ar said. "I am counting on Israel Police to track the vandals and bring them to justice."

According to the Center of Organizations of Holocaust Survivors in Israel, as of 2010, there are some 167,000 survivors still alive in the Jewish state.

Vandals defaced the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem over the weekend. Graffiti were sprayed throughout the complex. In the upper photo, the walls surrounding the iconic sculpture honouring the fighters of the Warsaw Ghetto were defaced with multiple messages. The message to the right of the sculpture reads: "If Hitler had not existed, the Zionists would have invented him." In the lower photo, workers remove the graffiti. The spray-painted message read: "Thank you Hitler for the wonderful Holocaust. Thanks to you we got a country," signed "The international Jewish mafia." [Flash90 photos]

CANADA

Ottawa Chides IOC

OTTAWA — Ottawa is urging the International Olympic Committee (IOC) to accept Israel's request for a moment of silence at the 2012 Olympic Games in honour of the 40th anniversary of the murder of 11 Israeli athletes and coaches at the 1972 Munich Olympics. Foreign Minister John Baird and Minister of State (Sport) Bal Gosal wrote to IOC chair Jacques Rogge June 7 to make the request. Meanwhile, Liberal justice and human rights critic Irwin Cotler last week called on all parties to adopt a motion he will soon introduce in the House of Commons in favour of a moment of silence. The IOC has consistently rejected calls for a moment of silence at the 2012 Games, as well at previous Games.

Conditions Imposed

MONTREAL — One of two men who firebombed the chassidic Skver community's boys' school Toldos Yakov Yosef in September 2006 had strict conditions imposed on his release from jail when his seven-year term expired June 11. Omar Bulphred, 27, and his accomplice Azim Ibragimov were charged with hate crimes for throwing a Molotov cocktail into the entrance of the school. They also pleaded guilty to uttering threats in a letter in which they spoke of jihad and demanded the release of a group of men, linked to an Islamist cell, arrested on terror charges in Toronto in 2006 that included a plot to kill the prime minister. Among the conditions being imposed for two years is that Bulphred have no contact with or follow any correctional employees, because he made what were interpreted as indirect threats against corrections staff while in jail.

Suspects Arrested

PARIS — Two suspects have been arrested in connection with an attack on three Jewish teens in Lyon, France. The pair turned themselves in June 6, Agence France Presse reported. The "main perpetrator" of the attack has not yet been apprehended, the local police chief Albert Doutre said The attack, which occurred June 2, took place in Villeurbanne, near Lyon. The attackers, who reportedly numbered about 10, injured two of the Jewish victims with a hammer and an iron bar, sending them to hospital. The attackers were described as "of North-African origin." In March, a rabbi and his two young sons and the daughter of the head of a Jewish school in Toulouse were shot and killed by a Muslim gunman who stormed the school.

McGill Jewish Studies Gets $1M Bequest

MONTREAL — McGill University's department of Jewish studies has received a $1-million gift from the estate of Simon and Ethel Flegg.

The money will be used to help establish postdoctoral fellowships, as well as an educational partnership with McGill Hillel.

Simon Flegg escaped Nazi Germany in 1938 and became a successful businessman in Canada, later setting up a vocational school in Montreal. He and his wife, Ethel, who were childless, were strong supporters of Jewish culture and education in Canada and Israel.

The new partnership with McGill Hillel will give Jewish studies students the opportunity to enrich their studies through experiential learning opportunities offered by Hillel. The gift will help the department "attract leading young scholars and strengthen its ties to the community through a partnership with Hillel," said faculty of arts dean Christopher Manfredi. "It is a fitting gift as we approach the 45th anniversary of the department of Jewish studies."

The department offers an interdisciplinary approach to learning. Students can explore Jewish studies within seven broad areas: biblical studies, east European studies, Jewish history, Jewish thought, language and literature, modern Jewish studies, and rabbinic studies. The teacher training program is run in conjunction with the faculty of education.

COR unveils new vegetarian, vegan hechsher

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Vegetarians and vegans here have often wished for the same reliable supervision that kosher consumers take for granted.

"Other parts of the world have had certification systems going back 10, 15 years," says David Alexander, executive director of the Toronto Vegetarian Association (TVA). Now, at last, Canada has a vegetarian certification program run by COR, the kosher certifying agency of the Kashruth Council of Canada.

The Kashruth Council's VegeCert symbol is a "companion symbol" that would either stand alone or be accompanied by a COR symbol, says Richard Rabkin, VegeCert's managing director.

Several products already bear the logo, including Sweets from the Earth desserts and the Raw Foodz line of dressings and spreads.

Rabkin, who's been with the Kashruth Council for a year and a half, says when he first came on board, he was startled to learn that according to some estimates, only 15 to 20 per cent of consumers looking for a kosher symbol are actually Jewish. Others are vegetarians, vegans, individuals eating kosher for religious reasons, and those seeking an additional measure of food quality and safety.

Rabkin realized it was time to find out how the COR could better serve this constituency. He was surprised by how much TVA leaders knew about kashrut.

"They were asking about all the differences between dairy, pareve, even D-E [a designation meaning a product is pareve, but produced on lines that have been used for dairy foods]."

Ultimately, the TVA sent out a survey to its members to gauge how receptive they'd be to a certifying agency and what standards they'd like to see as part of that certification. From that feedback emerged the VegeCert certification.

While many vegetarians have relied for years on kosher symbols, "not every single vegetarian knows about kosher," Rabkin says.

Additionally, the new logo assures vegetarians that their unique needs – as identified by the survey – are being met.

Certifying vegetarian products is not exactly the same as kosher.

"Vegans may not necessarily be able to rely on [a kosher symbol] alone" because ingredients that are kosher, and even pareve, may not be suitable for those who avoid all animal products. Forbidden ingredients include eggs and, for many, honey.

Some vegetarians indicated that they rely on reading ingredient lists, yet Rabkin says that's not enough, because dairy, egg and even insect ingredients (though not kosher) lurk behind chemical-sounding names and abstractions like "artificial colour."

Idealists rebuild Jerusalem

From the editor's desk...

Political and social commentators Dan Senor and Saul Singer have tagged Israel as being the preeminent "startup" nation in the world. The tag has stuck. And deservedly so.

After their army service, large numbers of young Israelis – among them highly motivated, risk-taking, solution-seeking people who develop high tech and other electronic marvels – test themselves and their ideas in the wave and crash of the rough and tumble business world.

But not all young Israelis, after their tour of duty in the army, surf in the high waves of business trying to make their fortunes in the neon and stardom of the startup world.

Some, like Ben Erely, Dana Merzel and Omer Shafrir, test their mettle, their ideas and their ideals in the grimy, hard-scrabble streets of the poor and the needy. Social workers, counsellors, community organizers and activists, the three 30-something Israelis work in the close and cluttered neighbourhood of Kiryat Hayovel, one of the poorest in Jerusalem.

For millennia we have prayed for the rebuilding and restoration of Jerusalem. But it is the highly motivated solution seekers such as Erely, Merzel and Shafrir who actually do it. They strive to rebuild rough neighbourhoods even as they strive to "rebuild" the lives of the people who live in those neighbourhoods.

Kiryat Hayovel is in the southwest part of Jerusalem. Housing first appeared on this lovely hilltop after Israel's War of Independence in 1948. To provide new homes for the waves of refugees from Europe and the Arab world arriving daily to the newly sovereign Jewish state and even well into the 1960s, the authorities built large-scale, high-density housing projects, long, cinder-block rectangular structures of small apartment units. Nor did they use the iconic Jerusalem stone on the buildings' exteriors. They were unimaginative, heavy, squat, dull, colourless, "Soviet-style" dwellings. In those days, speed and efficiency were the rallying cry, not esthetics or charm.

Though there are indeed some very lovely parts to Kiryat Hayovel, it is described as primarily an impoverished, down-on-its-luck neighbourhood where thousands of people from diverse backgrounds live clustered and crowded lives.

That is why, some five years ago, City Hall decided to change things there.

Ben Erely

Omer Shafrir and Dana Merzel

Not surprisingly, the Jerusalem Foundation became involved immediately. The important task of restoring Kiryat Hayovel, fell fully within the foundation's mandate of "building" Jerusalem. The foundation sees its work in Kiryat Hayovel as creating "a massive, multi-disciplinary investment that will succeed in bringing about significant, visible change by bringing more young people to the area."

He guides a visitor from The CJN on a walk through the neighbourhood, pointing out some of the sites and sores of the area, old broken-down grates and new improvement projects, too, earnestly greeting whomever he meets, smiling his own sunshine into their mornings.

On a different street in the neighbourhood, described to The CJN as the "Harlem of Jerusalem," the visitor from Canada walked with Merzel and Shafrir. Like Erely, they reach out to the Jerusalemites who live on the other side, so to speak, of Jerusalem's golden hills.

They described their mission as trying to "build the human tissue" of the neighbourhood. By that they meant fostering among the residents a sense of confidence and belief in their own skills and abilities, planting in them the notion of inter-connectedness among all the residents of the neighbourhood, strengthening the sense of common interests and a shared future.

The young idealists work in a place where the living conditions are substandard. The levels of income, the levels of self-confidence, the levels of neighbourhood resources are also substandard.

"How do we create a new social dynamic among people who are used to constantly hearing the same negative epithets spoken about themselves or the same excuses used to explain "their failures?" the young idealists asked The CJN. "It's quite a challenge," they said.

As long as these young idealists and the countless others like them are ready to struggle with that challenge in Jerusalem, the Jerusalem Foundation will be the wind at their backs. And perhaps one day, a new Kiryat Hayovel will sail forward. –MBD

Judeo-Moroccan culture shared through art

Michelle Bitran
Intern

An exhibition of Jewish Moroccan art and relics is part of Toronto's first-ever weeklong festival celebrating 2,000 years of Jewish life in Morocco and 50 years of Canadian-Moroccan diplomatic relations.

The exhibit, created by the Communauté Juive Marocaine de Toronto (CJMT), aims to preserve Jewish Moroccan culture as well as educate viewers.

"They'll learn about our culture, our heritage," said Claire Benezra, the chair of the exhibition and secretary of the CJMT. She hopes the greater community, as well as younger generations of Moroccan Jews, will visit and learn from the exhibit.

The opening of the art and artifact show was marked with a reception at Glendon College, where members of the community were invited to view the pieces, learn about Sephardi history in Morocco and enjoy refreshments.

The gallery room houses a collection of paintings by Jewish Moroccan artist Prosper Trojman and photographs of Jewish life in Morocco by Aaron Vincent Elkaim, as well as various family heirlooms and artifacts brought from Morocco, including traditional ceremonial clothing, a shofar, a kiseh Eliyahu, chanukiyot, jewelry, art and books.

The rich texture of Trojman's paintings of Moroccan Judaica and the lush emerald-green fabric of the outfit on display, worn by brides at the traditional henna party before the wedding, give a taste of the vibrant culture of Moroccan Jews.

Many of the artifacts were brought for display by families in Toronto. Benezra herself displayed drawings that her father had made in Morocco.

She said the cultural celebration, sponsored by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Sephardic Federation, Friends of the Simon Weisenthal Center and private donors, has brought together the 18,000-strong Moroccan-Jewish community in the city.

"[It's] very exciting," she said. "[I'm] very happy to have this contact with the whole community. You have a feeling of togetherness that you didn't have before."

Simon Keslassy, the president of the CJMT, added that he hopes the togetherness will extend beyond the Moroccan and Sephardi community. "We want the Ashkenazis and the students of the university to see the rich [Judeo Moroccan] patrimony," he said.

Keslassy, whose father was a jeweller in Mogador (now Essaouira), Morocco, proudly displayed a 120-year-old bracelet that has been in his family for generations. He also brought in a framed kabbalistic text given to him by the Moroccan Jewish community in Israel.

For Allen (Yehuda) Azoulay, a proponent of Sephardi heritage and education and a contributor to the artifacts exhibit, the importance of educating younger generations about their culture is vital. "It's something to be proud of and to share," he said.

He's "very concerned" that the ancient customs and the history of Moroccan Jews could be lost if future generations do not get interested and involved. Azoulay said that the CJMT celebration is an important step in sharing and passing on the culture. "The tradition is still going on," he said. "We just have to maintain it."

The exhibit will be on display at Glendon College until June 28. Admission is free. For more information, visit www.cjmt.org.

City council condemns term 'Israeli apartheid'

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Toronto has officially condemned the term "Israeli apartheid" as part of a compromise to fund the city's annual Pride festival.

City council last week voted unanimously to grant nearly $104,000 to Pride Toronto. It also voted to denounce the controversial term that forms part of the name of Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA), an anti-Zionist group that has been participating in Pride events since 2008.

QuAIA didn't take part in Toronto's 2011 Pride Week, bowing to pressure from Pride organizers and the city's gay community to ensure the city's grant flowed to the festival after an acrimonious public debate threatened to see the city cut its funding.

Pride Toronto also instituted a new dispute-resolution mechanism last year as a result of the controversy surrounding QuAIA's participation in prior parades.

Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu Toronto, the city's main Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered organization, told The CJN she was happy with council's decision to condemn the term "Israeli apartheid," and that hers would be the first group to trigger Pride Toronto's dispute-resolution process regarding QuAIA.

Kulanu was scheduled to file its complain with Pride last Friday.

The dispute-resolution committee, made up of legal experts and community members, has been empowered by Pride Toronto to examine any complaints against parade applicants and decide whether they can officially participate.

Apple was hopeful her complaint would be reviewed before Pride Week, which this year begins on June 22 and culminates in the annual Pride Parade on July 1.

However, the committee has 30 days to review any complaint, which could mean QuAIA's status as a participant might not be decided until well after Pride Week this year, Apple said.

For more on this evolving story, go to The CJN's website at cjnews.com.

Anti-hate law repealed

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The House of Commons last week adopted a private members bill that will repeal the section of the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA) that addresses Internet and telephone hate speech.

In a free vote of 153 to 136 that largely followed party lines, the Commons supported a bill by Alberta Conservative backbencher Brian Storseth that will repeal Section 13 of the CHRA.

The bill still has to be approved by the Senate before it receives royal assent and becomes law.

Storseth said the repeal would be a "vote for freedom." He called Section 13 a "vague and highly subjective law" that "an overzealous bureaucracy" had been using to suppress Canadians' right to freedom of expression.

Storseth said the current human rights legislation allows too many frivolous cases to proceed against citizens and that hate-incitement provisions of the Criminal Code, as enforced by the courts, are the proper venue to deal with hate speech.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said the repeal of Section 13 must be accompanied by greater reliance on the Criminal Code.

Section 13 as it stood was inadequate to the task of tackling hate speech, Fogel said, but unless there was greater use of the Criminal Code, "this would be replacing one problem with another."

Vulnerable minorities must be protected from hate speech, he said. "Ultimately, we are indifferent as to whether the Criminal Code becomes the instrument or a modified Section 13 continued to be the platform. One or the other would be fine.

"The problem has been the lack of will on behalf of attorneys-general and a lack of co-ordination between governments to ensure there is a single approach to the problem."

Though the Criminal Code is a national law, it is enforced provincially and in the case of hate-crime prosecutions, cases cannot proceed without the consent of the provincial attorney general.

Section 13 cases under the CHRA are adjudicated by civil servants sitting as a tribunal. The type of evidence that can be heard, the standard of proof and other legal safeguards are much stricter in criminal prosecutions.

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Canada, agreed that "there are problems with the operation of Section 13." However, "the law must strike a balance between preventing the abuse of the Internet and protecting individual rights to privacy and free speech. In as much we all believe in absolute freedom, our freedom is in reality protected by laws and social safeguards that help shield us against harm from each other and from civil disobedience. Without guiding posts or red lines that protect us against hateful behaviour, inequity would result, leading to a loss of freedom and tolerance for all."

Bashar Assad's heart of darkness

The slaughter of innocents in Syria is escalating in a near frenzy of cruelty and sadism. Even women and children have become targets of government forces. International observers estimate that more than 8,000 people have been killed by President Bashar Assad since he began defending and reasserting his total control over his police state against the clamouring from some of his people for some measures of democratic reform 15 months ago. Syrian rebel groups fighting Assad say the death toll has passed 14,000.

Last Sunday alone Syrian troops used heavy weapons in Homs. At least 35 civilians were killed. Dozens were killed over the weekend.

Despite wielding so heavy a blood-stained hand, Assad may in fact be losing control of parts of the country. Last weekend, for example, according to an Al-Arabiya report, rebel forces took control of a Syrian air force base near the city of Homs and with it, of course, control of the surface-to-air-missiles on the base.

Thus, not surprisingly, the deepening chaos and anarchy are causing great consternation in Israel. At a memorial event Sunday in Jerusalem honouring soldiers who fell in the first war in Lebanon, the IDF's Deputy Chief of Staff, Maj.-Gen. Yair Naveh, warned against the possibility that Syria's chemical arsenal, the world's largest, might fall into the hands of Iran's surrogates in Lebanon, Hezbollah, or other terrorist organizations.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu described the situation in Syria as "a massacre of civilians, including of children and the elderly."

Deputy Prime Minister Shaul Mofaz said "a crime against humanity – genocide – is being conducted in Syria today. And the silence of the world powers is contrary to all human logic."

President Shimon Peres added that the world was not doing enough to stop the bloodshed in Syria.

Along with his utter lack of conscience and penchant for prevarication, Assad has now also put on full display his heart of darkness, a sinister, evil place where the lives of people, let alone his own people, are dismissed like detritus thrown onto the streets. Former UN secretary general Kofi Annan, who had tried to broker an end to the intra-Syrian fighting and who put his faith in the Syrian dictator, is only the most recent witness to Assad's smiling duplicity and murderous intentions.

Evan Zelikovitz, the Ottawa community activist writing this week in The CJN (See the Perspectives essay) is absolutely correct when he writes about the Assad regime, "We must take sides. The world simply has a moral obligation to do something."

25 years ago in The CJN

Opposition Liberal MP Herb Gray, the first Jew to sit in a federal cabinet, marked 25 years in the House of Commons. Gray was appointed to cabinet in 1969 by prime minister Pierre Trudeau as a minister without portfolio. He later served under Trudeau as minister of national revenue, minister of consumer and corporate affairs, and as industry minister until the Liberals' defeat in 1984.

Archeological dig at Masada

Alex Gropper's column on archeologist Yigael Yadin brought back memories ("Inspiration from Israel and Hollywood," May 31). I arrived in Israel in 1961 as a 20-year-old, and in 1963 I took a month's holiday from working at Amcor and signed up for Yadin's archeological dig team at Masada for four weeks. The dig was sponsored in part by the London Observer, which had some reporters there writing articles. One day, a British volunteer, a beautiful young non-Jewish girl whom I befriended on the dig, and who was working next to me, was asked by a reporter what brought her to Masada, a very specific Jewish site with absolutely no meaning for a non-Jew. She answered him by lifting a 10- to 15-kilogram rock and moving it a few feet. Then she pointed to it and said, "I am the first person in 2,000 years to move that rock – that is history, and history belongs to all." The Observer then did an article on this young lady.

Saddened by columnist's statement

There is an old Yiddish expression, "Es tsu schver tsu zan a Yid," or in English, "It's tough to be a Jew." Nothing exemplifies that more than Gil Troy's column, "No, McGill is not antisemitic," May 31). How unfair! To quote him, "We need to set the highest standards for the pro-Israel community, demanding truth, consistency, nuance and accuracy." But, of course, our opponents, the Arabs and the antisemites, can demonize Israel using any tactic they see as successful. The unfortunate fact that I agree with Troy saddens me even more.

Objects to Tel Aviv U's Nakba Day

Bernard Katz completely misses the point of objections to the Nakba Day celebrations at Tel Aviv University (Letters, June 7). As Katz surely knows, Israeli Arabs have complete freedom to say whatever they want, and nobody is trying to "suppress their right to express their views." However, holding this dubious ceremony on the grounds of a publicly funded institution is clearly objectionable. In effect, the State of Israel and those who support Tel Aviv U financially found themselves paying to have the state demonized and delegitimized by those who seek to destroy it. If that isn't disgraceful and offensive, I don't know what is.

Remembering Rabbi Jonathan Plaut

It was with great sadness that we heard of the passing of Rabbi Jonathan Plaut, on April 17. He was my family's spiritual leader at Congregation Temple Beth El, when we lived in Windsor, Ont., in the 1970s and 1980s.

Rabbi Plaut, who was well loved by the Jewish community, instilled the importance of our obligation to continue the rituals of our Jewish heritage, learn the Hebrew language and partake in community involvement. He demonstrated compassion and advocated intellectual pursuits. "Do you notice that in almost every Jewish household there are shelves of books?" he once asked. He had that quintessential Jewish-man humour and admonished one when circumstances merited, such as when our temple youth group purposely ordered an "unacceptable" pizza and he threw us all out! Rabbi Plaut understood the obstacles for Israel settling the West Bank and advocated, in the 1970s, achieving peace in the Middle East by establishing a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

During a children's service at Sunday morning Hebrew school, sitting up on the bimah and covering his eyes, Rabbi Plaut recited this prayer from the siddur, "Grant us peace, thy most precious gift, O Thou Eternal Source of Peace, and enable Israel to be its messenger unto all peoples of the Earth." Indeed, Rabbi Plaut was a precious gift to the Windsor Jewish community.

The bloodshed in Syria must stop: we must take sides

Evan Zelikovitz

One month ago, I returned from the most uplifting two-week journey into humanity, chaperoning 16 Ottawa high school students on the March of the Living program.

The March, 25 years strong in existence, is an international educational experience that brings together young and old from all over the world, to Poland and then Israel.

Seven hundred Canadians and more than 10,000 people participated in the 2012 March, a two-week journey that pays tribute to Holocaust survivors and victims and to those brave individuals who fought for freedom and what was right, despite the risks in doing so. But in its purest form, the March is simply about embracing humanity, even during the darkest of times, when humanity seems all but lost.

After all the horror and suffering we witnessed during the Holocaust, and then afterwards in Cambodia, Croatia, Darfur, Sudan and now Syria, it is shameful that we still have not learned from our mistakes, and that we continue to allow global politics and diplomacy to trump humanity.

The world has become aware of the recent massacre in Houla, Syria, of more than 100 people, including nearly three dozen children under the age of 10. As a result, Canada and other nations have taken action to expel Syrian diplomats. Unfortunately this sort of diplomatic and political gesturing will do very little to stop Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and his reign of terror.

I am not naïve. I understand the bigger picture in Syria and within the Middle East region. Indeed it is complicated. It always has been. But there is simply no excuse for the innocent slaughter of children – not in politics. Not anywhere. And I recognize that what comes after the fall of tyranny is not always rosy – it has its own uncertainties, consequences and problems. But the unknown is not an excuse to continue to allow such unthinkable and meaningless atrocities. We must take sides.

The world simply has a moral obligation to do something. The road may be long and hard and more lives will be lost but we can no longer sit in our ivory towers, thousands of miles away and watch as innocent bystanders, while one man's need for power destroys other innocent bystanders.

It is shameful. If Syria was rich in oil and gas resources, perhaps the world would care more. What an appalling statement and way to live. Sometimes things are worth fighting for. Not just oil or land or food. When we fail to understand that humanity is worth fighting for, then we have simply failed. We have failed our children and we have failed to teach them what is and can be good about this world we live in.

When we don't engage for the sake of something as simple as protecting humanity, then we have shown two things: we have lost our way as human beings, and we confirm that we have learned nothing from the past.

It is time for politics and diplomacy to take a back seat and let the chips fall where they may. I know that courageous soldiers from Canada, United States, England and elsewhere will die. But they will not die in vain. I don't say this easily. I am not a soldier, nor are my children. It is hard to put myself in the shoes of those I ask to risk their lives for freedom and humanity. But we must take sides.

The time has come to forget about the pending re-elections of our world leaders. The time has come to cast aside uncertainties of Middle East and geopolitical instability. Instability is already present.

It is time to stop thinking about what engagement in Syria might do and start thinking about what our lack of engagement is already doing. And we must stop thinking about why others should engage in a problem that is so far away from our everyday life. We must start realizing that the embracing of humanity is indeed our responsibility and that it impacts the way we live. We must take sides.

World renowned author and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel, best captured the stark reality of what is happening today in Syria and in other unfortunate places around the world. Sitting on the proverbial sidelines is no longer acceptable, Wiesel said.

"We must take sides. Neutrality helps the oppressor, never the victim. Silence encourages the tormentor, never the tormented. Sometimes we must interfere. When human lives are endangered, when human dignity is in jeopardy, national borders and sensitivities become irrelevant. Wherever men and women are persecuted because of their race, religion, or political views, that place must - at that moment - become the centre of the universe."

Simply put, we must take sides.

Syrian forces shoot at UN monitors

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — UN monitors seeking to reach the site of a new reported massacre of Syrian villagers by forces loyal to President Bashar Assad were shot at with small arms, UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon said last Thursday.

Ban, speaking at the start of a special UN General Assembly session on the Syrian crisis, condemned the reported massacre at Mazraat al-Qubeir and called again on Assad to immediately implement international mediator Kofi Annan's six-point peace plan.

"Today's news reports of another massacre ... are shocking and sickening," he told the 193-nation assembly. "A village apparently surrounded by Syrian forces. The bodies of innocent civilians lying where they were, shot. Some allegedly burned or slashed with knives."

"We condemn this unspeakable barbarity and renew our determination to bring those responsible to account," he said.

Ban said UN monitors were initially denied access to the site. "They are working now to get to the scene," he said. "And I just learned a few minutes ago that while trying to do so the UN monitors were shot at with small arms."

A short while afterward, a UN spokeswoman said that the United Nations monitors were unable to visit the village of Mazraat al-Qubeir on Thursday where activists say at least 78 people were massacred, and will continue efforts to reach the site on Friday in daylight hours.

"They are going back to their base in Hama and they will try again tomorrow morning," spokeswoman Sausan Ghosheh said. Chief observer General Robert Mood said earlier they had been turned back by Syrian soldiers and also stopped by civilians.

Ban was addressing the General Assembly on Thursday ahead of Annan's expected presentation to the UN Security Council on Thursday of a new proposal in a last-ditch effort to rescue his failing peace plan for Syria, where 15 months of violence have brought it to the brink of civil war.

Speaking to the General Assembly after Ban, Annan also condemned the new reported massacre and acknowledged that his peace plan was not working.

The U.S. administration also condemned the massacre in Hama.

"The United States strongly condemns the outrageous targeted killings of civilians including women and children in Al-Qubeir in Hama province as reported by multiple credible sources", the White House spokesman said in a statement.

"This, coupled with the Syrian regime's refusal to let UN observers into the area to verify these reports, is an affront to human dignity and justice."

Israel's ambassador to the UN, Ron Prosor, issued a statement to the Syrian people on behalf of Israel.

"We hear your cries. We are horrified by the crimes of the Assad regime," Prosor said. "We extend our hand to you. Assad is not the only one with the blood of the Syrian people on his hands. Iran and Hezbollah sit on his advisory board, offering guidance on how to butcher the Syrian people more efficiently. It is high time for the voices of the victims in Syria to finally unite the voices of the world against the tyrant of Damascus."

Diplomats said the West has been pushing Russia to abandon Assad.

Annan's peace efforts have failed to halt the violence, as demonstrated by a recent massacre in Houla that led to the deaths of at least 108 men, women and children, most likely by the army and allied militia, according the United Nations.

Opposition members said there was a similar massacre last week in Hama province, with at least 78 people killed. UN monitors were prevented from reaching it, though a pro-government Syrian television station said the unarmed monitoring force did reach the village of Mazraat al-Qubeir.

Human rights activists estimate that as many as 8,000 people have been killed in Syria by the government and its forces.

That Ol' Lake of Fire has me in its spell

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

When a Christian minister in Alberta who was running for office asserted that homosexuals would burn in a lake of fire, Christians got the reference, but it may have mystified Jews.

Was he threatening to dump them in one of the tar sands sludge pools or a similarly polluted river?

No, he was quoting a punishment promised by John of Patmos in his Book of Revelation, the last book in the Christian Bible and a source of similar apocalyptic threats for the last 2,000 years.

As the good pastor was fulminating against those he saw qualifying for this final swim, I was reading the new book by Elaine Pagels, Revelations: Visions, Prophecy and Politics in the Book of Revelation.

Why would Jews have any interest in a Christian apocalyptic book? If not for the fact the minister was mouthing a despicable threat, we could pretty much ignore him.

A word about the book of Revelation: it was written by a Jewish Christian (although the term Christian had yet to be used) after the 70 CE destruction of the Second Temple and was directed at churches being formed in Asia Minor.

The Evil Empire to the author was Rome. The second enemy was those churches that, he felt, had strayed from the true faith. In her book, Pagels argues that, just as in other apocalyptic literature, John's writings had political as well as theological overtones.

In his visions, while he is "in the spirit," he foresees a terrible end of days when Rome will be vanquished, the faithful will be saved by a warrior Christ, and only the righteous will finally enjoy eternal bliss. Along the way, he has terrible punishments in store for the faithless and wicked, including that lake of fire and a terrible final conflict.

It's this lake that some have reserved for the devil and all his angels, and to which the ministerial candidate would assign homosexuals.

Lest we think the author made this up out of whole cloth, we should note that John drew extensively on Jewish apocalyptic canonical sources such as Ezekiel and Daniel, and other Jewish writers not included in the Hebrew Bible, but well known in John's era. Indeed, on Shavuot when we read from Habakkuk, we found the prophet's vision of destruction and salvation in terms similar to John's:

"[God's] majesty covers the skies/ His splendour fills the earth.../ Pestilence marches before Him/ And plague comes forth at His heels/ When He stands, He makes the earth shake.../ You have come forth to deliver Your people/ To deliver Your anointed."

The prophet was referring to the kingdom of Babylon, not Rome, as the enemy, but the sense of a terrible "day of the Lord" is clear.

For Isaiah, the end of days would see every nation come to the mountain of the Lord and worship in a restored Temple.

Two thousand years ago, other Jewish writers expected a war to the end – see the writings of the Dead Sea sect, for example. The Bar Kochba revolt was replete with messianic theology supported by Rabbi Akiva, among many others. That war's terrible aftermath pretty much put an end to overt messianic fervour. Most rabbis who came to control the narrative were in no mood to condone further outbursts of apocalyptic fever.

However, according to Gershom Scholem, in The Messianic Idea in Judaism, messianic longings and a vision of an apocalyptic upheaval continued to be found in Judaism. "Jewish Messianism is in its origins and by its nature – this cannot be sufficiently emphasized – a theory of catastrophe," he writes.

Messianic longings, and false messiahs, continued in Judaism. Even today, the idea that some one person may be the promised Messiah lingers. Elements within Israel regard the establishment of the state, as well as the "miraculous" recovery of old Jerusalem in 1967 and the territories, as a sign that the promised age of the Messiah is at hand.

So when we hear Christian claims that portents of the end are near (see the Left Behind series), we should acknowledge that within our own tradition there exists both the hope for a messiah and a belief that political events carry a hidden message.

Sadly, messianic claims for Jews have always ended in disaster. Also, to act on the assumption that political events will produce a messianic end will only continue to doom us to unrealistic expectations and bad, bad political choices.

The benefits of high school reunions

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

I recently attended the 50th reunion of my high school class. It was certainly fun to reminisce with old friends and to be reminded of youthful carefree days. But what's the purpose of such events?

In order to go to New York for the day, I had to make many preparations for my husband's care. I was also aware that some of my peers made a great effort to be present at our luncheon. What drove us to this celebration? What were we celebrating?

Reunions enable many people to gather together with diverse purposes who would ordinarily never find mutual interests. Simply because they were once in school together doesn't mean they currently have any common ground. Yet the opportunity to review the past and momentarily even relive it is enough to draw the group back together. So despite the difficulty of getting there, we gathered to see who would come, who would look the same and who would be unrecognizable.

Additionally, we linked up with our Israeli cohorts via Skype. Our school was an early Zionist establishment and 16 members of our grade (of 99 students) made aliyah. We had an opportunity to try to decipher the discussion going on in Israel as we communicated with friends and strangers in an apartment there. It was a noisy, fun-filled part of an amusing day. This part made us even more aware of our early education and its Israel connection. At that time, we weren't conscious of our school's early remarkable Zionist commitment. Now it became more obvious and noteworthy.

Thus a reunion can bring out unexpected patterns and themes from one's past. For some, they're obvious. For others, they're not worth mentioning. But sometimes the group experience highlights an element so clearly that even if it was acknowledged previously by individuals, the new group experience of knowing brings a heightened sense of identification.

But what can we understand of our varied purposes for a reunion? The school, of course, wanted to fundraise. That's the purpose of alumni organizations. But what did we, the alumni, want? Did we want to see old friends? I doubt that was the only reason, since we had not looked these people up before. Yet seeing old friends was fun and rewarding. More exciting was reviewing our youthful pranks and fun-filled days. We had good times at school, free from the heavy responsibilities we now face. It's a good ritual to remind you of that carefree feeling. So reunions are a good thing in and of themselves simply on that level.

Additionally, many people of a certain age long for their youth and in this form of remembrance can engage that lost youth. Certainly there was a lot of that going on. We went around the room recalling some of our precious memories. It was a group exercise – ritual-like – that seemed appropriate. It brought many smiles to our faces, as different reminiscences created a bag full of delight. What better way to celebrate getting older than to spend time with people who only knew you as being young. The vision shared is one of youth without any excuses or apologies.

It's true that some came to remake their image. They looked better or were smarter. Some had achieved more and were riding their success. But most were just happy to be there – happy to be alive. Given time, it was clear everyone had a story to tell. No one had escaped with a charmed life. Yet for that moment of re-connecting, we were back in our old classroom tormenting the teachers and principals – young and vibrant and eager, ready to face the world. In that context, we could now face each other as grownups.

Going back in time is useful if just for a moment, just for a celebration. The ritual of a reunion is helpful to remind us where we came from and what direction our lives have taken. It's constructive to meet old friends again and rehash those old stories. They set up a framework for understanding the present as we engage our stories and our identities and proceed to develop the map of expansion that builds upon the best of those old stories.

Turkey's alliance with Israel crumbles

Surveying the broken landscape of Israel's bilateral ties with Turkey since May 2010, when Israeli commandos killed nine Turks aboard the Turkish ship Mavi Marmara and Turkey responded by recalling its ambassador in Tel Aviv, an Israeli diplomat based in Istanbul struck an upbeat tone.

"Look, we've had our ups and downs," he said, implicitly referring to Turkey's decision in 1981 to downgrade relations with Israel after it formalized its annexation of eastern Jerusalem. "We're at a low point now, but we hope to come out of it and strengthen our relations."

Sheldon Kirshner in Istanbul

The diplomat added, "There is a strategic value in our relationship. As democracies, we have mutual interests and a shared desire for stability in this region. There is a will on both sides to resolve this issue. Where there is a will, there is a way."

In Ankara, a Turkish diplomat in charge of Turkey's relations with Israel sounded a hopeful note as well. "Our bilateral relations today are not what they once were. Turkey and Israel contributed to peace and stability in the Middle East, but when Israel's policies ran counter to these objectives, our relations deteriorated."

Turkey's political bonds with Israel, which morphed into something of an alliance in the wake of the 1990s Oslo peace process, have crumbled, having been sent into a downward spiral since Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip in 2009. Israel's incursion was sharply condemned by Turkey's outspoken prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who likened it to "state terrorism."

He widened the rift by insulting Israeli President Shimon Peres at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, while Israel's deputy foreign minister, Danny Ayalon, stoked further tensions by publicly humiliating Turkey's envoy in Israel. In the wake of Israel's raid on the Mavi Marmara, Turkey demanded a formal apology, reparations for Turkish lives lost and a lifting of the blockade.

Last September, following the release of a United Nations fact-finding report on the Mavi Marmara, Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu called the clash on the high seas "a crime against humanity." He proceeded to downgrade Turkey's relations with Israel to the second-secretary level and cancelled all military agreements with Israel.

Subsequently, in four rounds of talks held in Europe, Turkish and Israeli diplomats wrestled with the issue. Turkey claims an agreement was reached in which Israel would have accommodated Turkey's demands for an apology and compensation.

But due to "disagreements within the Israeli council of ministers, this agreement could not be implemented," Davutoglu said.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, encouraged by Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, declared that an apology would not be forthcoming, even though Israel has issued four apologies to Turkey in the last five years.

In 2007, Israel apologized for having violated Turkish airspace in the bombing of Syria's nuclear reactor. In 2009, Israel issued an apology after Israeli Gen. Avi Mizrachi accused Turkey of murdering Armenians and suppressing its Kurdish citizens. In 2010, Israel apologized for the mistreatment of Turkey's ambassador and for the "misunderstanding" in Davos. Since then, the situation has gone from bad to worse.

Last month, Turkey's chief prosecutor charged several high-ranking Israeli military officials, including the former chief of staff, with ordering the intentional killing of Turks on the Mavi Marmara. Before this announcement, Turkey scrambled F-16 fighters to confront Israeli aircraft reportedly violating Turkish Cyprus' airspace and then summoned Israel's chargé d'affaires in Ankara, Yosef Levi Sfari, to explain the intrusion.

Turkey maintains that the Greek Cypriot government has no right to sign oil and gas drilling agreements with Israel to the detriment of the Turkish Cypriot government. Turkey, having been increasingly assertive in the Middle East of late, disputes Israeli and Greek Cypriot territorial claims to offshore resources.

Amid the rhetoric, the United States' ambassador to Turkey, Francis Ricciardone, recently called on both sides to cool passions and mend fences. It is a tall order, given Turkey's visceral reaction to the Mavi Marmara affair. Turkey, for example, has restricted the use of its airspace to Israeli cargo planes and cut back on cultural exchanges.

As far as Israel is concerned, Erdogan, the leader of a socially conservative Islamic government, is the real problem. He has embraced Hamas, urged the United Nations to impose sanctions on Israel, branded recent Israeli air strikes in Gaza as a "massacre," decried Netanyahu's government as the "worst" in Israel's history, lambasted Lieberman as a "despicable" person and described Israel's nuclear arsenal as a threat to the Middle East. Last week, he accused Israel of mistreating Palestinians, "our brothers," in Gaza.

Israel, nonetheless, wants to improve relations with Turkey, the only Muslim member of NATO. But Israel's refusal to issue an official apology for the Mavi Marmara incident looms as a formidable obstacle. When asked whether Israel is prepared to apologize, an Israeli diplomat in Istanbul replied, "That's for negotiations. A compromise could be the answer. Israel has never shied away from compromises."

Ahmet Davutoglu

In Ankara, a Turkish diplomat said, "We are offering Israel a way out of this crisis. Turkey will completely normalize its relations with Israel if Israel issues an apology. Turkey's demands are clear. The future of our relations depends on what steps Israel takes."

The Mavi Marmara affair, he observed, left an "indelible mark in the minds and hearts of the Turkish people, and the fact that it came from a friendly power increased the indignation." Reiterating the abiding principle of Turkish foreign policy, he said, "We want zero problems with our neighbours. Our motto is, 'Peace at home and peace abroad.'"

He dismissed the notion that Turkey has distanced itself from Israel to curry favour with Arab states and the Palestinians. As he put it, "We don't need to do this to strengthen Turkey's position as a champion of the Palestinian cause. We're trying to develop good relations with everyone. We don't design our policy at the expense of anyone."

Rifat Bali, a historian, claims that the honeymoon era in Israeli-Turkish relations has passed and that even an Israeli apology would not be enough for Turkey.

"The Turkish-Israeli alliance was an anomaly. Before the 1990s, it did not exist. Things are back to normal now. The Turkish military drove this alliance, and today, the generals don't have a say in it. Turkey needed Israel for two things: weapons and lobbying against the Armenian lobby in Washington. Today, Turkey is more interested in expanding its influence in the Middle East."

Sami Kohen, a foreign affairs columnist, believes that both sides share responsibility for the Mavi Marmara fiasco. "Israel made a mistake opening fire on the Mavi Marmara and using excessive force," said Kohen, who urges Israel to apologize. "Israel could have seized the ship instead. Turkey is to be blamed for not discouraging the Mavi Marmara to leave port."

Absent the Mavi Marmara incident, he noted, Israel's bilateral relations with Turkey could have been "quite normal." At the end of the day, the Mavi Marmara incident was a historic watershed, having been the first direct clash between Turkey and Israel.

Exuding pessimism, Kohen said, "Israel has lost Turkey for quite some time to come."

Group fundraises for orphans of IDF soldiers

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

An upcoming fundraiser in Toronto for an organization called Israel Defence Forces Widows and Orphans (IDFWO), will help fund a three-week vacation for 45 Israeli children who have suffered the loss of a parent who died serving the State of Israel.

IDFWO is a non-profit association that provides social, emotional and financial support to 8,000 widows and orphans of Israel's fallen soldiers.

Some of the programs offered by the organization include education scholarships for orphans, a special event honouring IDF orphans enlisting in the army, medical assistance, and financial aid.

IDFWO also organizes a bar and bat mitzvah program that includes a visit with Israeli President Shimon Peres, a ceremony at the Kotel in Jerusalem and a reception attended by the Minister of Defense and the Chief of Staff.

But perhaps the biggest undertaking is the free vacation that IDFWO children are treated to, during which they spend two weeks at Camp Chi in the Chicago area, and a week travelling along North America's east coast.

Last year was the first time the group included Toronto in its itinerary, and IDFWO volunteer Daniel Tuksar said that after receiving such a warm welcome, a new group of 45 kids and 10 supervisors will travel to Toronto this summer, too.

The trip is free for the participants, and although some of its funding comes from the Israeli government, IDFWO mostly relies on donations from outside sources in the Diaspora.

Enter Toronto residents Stella and Peter Ekstein, who will host a fundraiser in their home on June 20.

Brig.-Gen (Res.) Eden Attias, Israel's Ministry of Defence attaché to Canada; Hadas Wittenberg Silberstein, deputy consul general of Israel in Toronto, and IDFWO chairperson Nava Shoham-Solan will attend the event and address the guests.

Peter Ekstein, a Jewish community leader, said that after meeting Shoham-Solan when she was here with the IDFWO kids in 2011, he was eager to lend a hand to further the cause.

"I don't have a role with the organization. I'm just very involved in the community, and I have a very strong affinity to Israel and the IDF. I'm involved with the Association of the Soldiers of Israel and a number of projects in Israel. I have a number of good friends in the IDF and very good friends who have sons in the IDF," Ekstein said.

"Soldiers are on a lot of people's radar screens, but not many people think about their widows or surviving children. When I met with Nava, I realized this was something worth supporting."

He said he's expecting more that 50 people at his home next week to raise funds for what he considers an important cause.

"As part of a personal philosophy, I believe we are only able to live the lives we live here as Jews and walk the streets with our heads held high because of the State of Israel. Without the IDF, there is no State of Israel, and that is why it is incumbent upon us to support the IDF," Ekstein said.

Tuksar said the trip, which is meant to give the children a break from reality and let them meet other kids who have also lost a parent, will begin July 12 when the kids head to camp in Illinois for two weeks. On July 26, the group will travel to New York City, then spend the weekend in Connecticut before arriving in Toronto on July 30.

He said volunteers, most of whom are members of Beit Avraham Yoseph Synagogue of Toronto, will host the group and organize fun activities such as a bowling night at the Bathurst Bowlerama, a day at Canada's Wonderland, a tour of Niagara Falls and an afternoon at Debbie and Warren Kimel's family cottage.

The Jewish Messiah...and Why Jesus Doesn't Qualify

Christian missionaries, like Jews for Jesus, claim that Jesus is the Jewish messiah! Why has Judaism rejected this assertion for 2,000 years?

The concept of the Messiah has its foundation in our Jewish Bible, the Tanach, which teaches that all of the following criteria must be fulfilled before any person can be acknowledged as the Messiah:

Ingathering of the Jewish Exiles

When the Messiah is reigning as King of Israel, the Jewish people will be ingathered from their exile and will return to Israel, their homeland (Deut. 30:3; Isaiah 11:11-12; Jeremiah 30:3, 32:37; Ezekiel 11:17, 36:24).

Jesus never reigned as king and the Jewish people have not yet all returned to live in their promised homeland.

Rebuilding of the Holy Temple

The Temple in Jerusalem will be rebuilt (Isaiah 2:2-3, 56:6-7, 60:7, 66:20; Ezekiel 37:26–27; Malachi 3:4; Zechariah 14:20-21).

The Temple was still standing in Jesus' day. It was destroyed about 38 years after Jesus' crucifixion and it has not yet been rebuilt.

Worldwide Reign of Peace

There will be universal disarmament and world-wide peace with a complete end to war (Micah 4:1-4; Hoseah 2:20; Isaiah 2:1-4, 60:18).

Wars have increased dramatically in the world since the advent of Christianity.

Embracing of Torah Observance by All Jews

The Messiah will reign as King at a time when all the Jewish people will observe G-d's commandments (Ezekiel 37:24; Deuteronomy 30:8,10; Jeremiah 31:32; Ezekiel 11:19-20, 36:26-27).

Universal Knowledge of G-d

The Messiah will rule at a time when all the people of the world will come to acknowledge and serve the one true G-d (Zech. 3:9, 8:23, 14:9,16; Isaiah 45:23, 66:23; Jeremiah 31:33; Ezekiel 38:23; Psalm 86:9; Zeph. 3:9).

This, as well, has not yet taken place and we await its fulfillment.

From the Tribe of Judah and a Descendant of King David and King Solomon

The Messiah must be a member of the tribe of Judah (Genesis 49:10) and a direct descendant of King David and King Solomon (2 Samuel 7:12-14; I Chronicles 22:9-10). Genealogy in the Bible is only passed down from father to son (Numbers 1:1-18).

There is no evidence that Jesus really had this pedigree, and the Christian Bible actually claims that he did not have a "birth-father" from the tribe of Judah descending from David and Solomon (Matthew 1:18-20).

A Biblical Portrait of the Messiah

All of these criteria for the Messiah are found in numerous places in the Jewish Bible. One foundational example is in the book of Ezekiel, Chapter 37:24-28:

And My servant David will be king over them, and they will all have one shepherd, and they will walk in My ordinances, and keep My statutes, and observe them and they shall live on the land that I gave to Jacob My servant, in which your fathers have lived; and they shall live there, they, and their children, and their children's children forever; and My servant David will be their prince for ever. Moreover I will make a covenant of peace with them; it will be an everlasting covenant, which I will give them; and I will multiply them, and will set My sanctuary in their midst forever and My tabernacle shall be with them, and I will be their God and they will be My people. And the nations will know that I am the Lord who sanctifies Israel, when My sanctuary is in their midst forever.

Anyone can claim to be the Messiah or a group of people can claim that someone is the Messiah. However, if that person fails to fulfill all the criteria found in the Jewish Bible, he cannot be the Messiah. According to the Christian scriptures, Jesus seems to have understood this. As he was being crucified by the Romans, he cried out "My G-d, my G-d, why have You forsaken me?" (Matthew 27:46)

The Christian Rebuttal

In order to deal with Jesus' failure to fulfill the Biblical messianic prophecies, missionaries argue that he will accomplish them when he returns in the future.

It is important to understand that this doctrine of a "second coming" is an admission that Jesus did not fulfill the Messianic criteria. This rationalization for his failure certainly provides no reason for accepting him as the Messiah today. Furthermore, the Jewish Bible does not have a Messianic "installment plan" where the Messiah comes, fails in his mission, and then returns thousands of years later to finally succeed.

Missionaries will claim that because Jesus performed miracles, he must be the Messiah. We, however, have no real evidence that Jesus actually performed any miracles. More significantly, even if Jesus did perform miracles, they would not prove that he was the Messiah. Our Bible never says that we will be able to recognize the Messiah through the miracles that he will do. The Torah actually teaches that even false prophets can have the ability to perform supernatural miracles (Deuteronomy 13:2-6).

The Real Messiah

As Jews, we prefer to wait for the real thing according to G-d's promises and guidelines. The Jewish Bible provides a clear and consistent description of what the world will look like when the Messiah comes – and this has clearly not yet transpired. So, we still await the coming of the real Messiah. May he and a true utopian world come soon! ■

Several COR-certified companies embrace symbol

He hopes to maintain an ongoing relationship with the TVA to keep up with mainstream vegetarian and vegan standards.

Currently, several U.S organizations offer vegetarian certification, including the most widely recognized, Vegan Action (a heart with a V inside and the words "certified vegan"). But the VegeCert model differs in two major ways, Rabkin says.

"First, we give both certified vegetarian and certified vegan designations. Second, we make actual inspections, real-time in the facility."

He adds that other organizations simply give approval to a list of ingredients, with a yearly review. "Our experience with the Kashruth Council of Canada is that it's extremely important to make physical inspections of the facilities. You'll never know what's going on… unless there's some sort of control mechanism in place."

For vegetarians and those with food allergies, Alexander agrees that "an inspection process is a really helpful and reassuring thing… We have confidence [in the Kashruth Council] because of their track record."

Rabkin says certification will mainly appeal to companies who are already kosher-certified. While vegetarian certification on products that are not kosher may be possible – it's been approved in theory by a rabbinic advisory board – in practice, it's unlikely.

"Why wouldn't you want to open yourself up to the kosher market?" he asks.

Plus, the price might prove prohibitive. Once a business is kosher, "it's very easy for us to make VegeCert inspections… the costs aren't going to be that much more significant."

Raw Foodz' Sher Kopman is confident the new VegeCert Certified Vegan logo will extend her products' reach beyond the Jewish community.

"Not everyone in the general population will really understand what the COR [hechsher] is," she says, while the VegeCert logo, which joins existing COR and EcoCert (organic) symbols on her labels, reinforces "the thought and care about every ingredient that we put into our product line."

Several COR-certified companies have already embraced the new symbol, which Kopman says she received for the first year at no charge as part of her company's initial kosher certification.

TVA's Alexander is looking forward to seeing more companies embrace the new logo. "It is useful not to have to read all the ingredients… a symbol can be really time-saving."

While COR is the first kashrut organization in Canada offering vegetarian certification, Earth Kosher, a small New Jersey organization, does offer a joint kosher/vegan certification program. Another organization in L.A., Kosher Vegan Raw, certifies vegan raw and live foods.

Sotheby's official seeks Israeli art

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israeli art is on the ascendancy in the international marketplace, says a top-level Sotheby's official.

"There has been a tremendous growth in appreciation of contemporary Israeli art in the last few years," said Jennifer Roth, the auction house's senior vice-president.

Roth, who organizes the annual Israel art and Judaica sales in New York and serves on the board of Sotheby's Tel Aviv branch, will be in Toronto from June 19 to 21.

She will be here to find "hidden Israeli art treasures in Canadian collections" and, under the sponsorship of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, will give a talk on the development of Israeli art from the founding of the Bezalel Academy in Jerusalem in 1906 to the present day.

"In recent years, Israeli art has exploded on the global scene," said Roth, who was in Israel last week. "More and more young Israeli artists are appearing at biennials and curated exhibitions."

She added, "At the same time, there is growing competition for classic Israeli art of earlier periods, from the 1920s to the 1979s, both from Israelis and international collectors."

The boom began about a decade ago, she noted.

"Around this time, Israeli artists like Guy Ben Ner starting showing up in prestigious masters programs, and Bezalel launched its own masters program."

As well, she said, more Israeli galleries opened and some started taking booths in international fairs. At auctions today, the most popular Israeli works are by masters such as Reuven Rubin and Mordecai Ardon, whose paintings have fetched sums well over six figures. Meanwhile, the photographer Adi Nes sold a work, based on Leonardo da Vinci's The Last Supper, for more than $250,000.

Eighth graders interview survivors for film

Michelle Bitran
Intern

As Holocaust survivors age, the younger generations of the Jewish community are scrambling to hear and share as many of their stories as possible.

In 2003, Tova Rosenberg created a new and interactive way to teach middle and high school students about the Holocaust, and to have the students bond with survivors from their community. She dubbed her project Names, Not Numbers.

The program has students research, interview and film Holocaust survivors under the guidance of a professional team with the aim of creating a powerful full-length documentary film.

Several day schools in the United States have picked up the Names, Not Numbers program, but so far Netivot HaTorah Day School is the only one in Canada to do so. The third group of Grade 8 students at Netivot to go through the program presented its film on May 31.

"The Holocaust did not happen to numbers – it happened to people. Each one with a name, a face and history," Rosenberg told a crowd of students, families and Holocaust survivors who gathered at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto at the premiere of this year's Names, Not Numbers film.

Rosenberg, the former principal of the now-closed Richmond Hill branch of what is now Robbins Hebrew Academy, is the director of the Hebrew language department at Yeshiva University High School in New York.

"Although it's a school project, it's not a school project," said Rosenberg, explaining that the hands-on nature of Names, Not Numbers is ideal for students who don't work as well in traditional classroom settings.

This year, the 57 Grade 8 students at Netivot were divided into groups to interview 11 Holocaust survivors. The project co-ordinator, Lesley Schwartz, taught the children the history of the Shoah, helped them do research on their survivors and brought in professionals to show the students how to carry out productive hour-long interviews and how to use the film equipment.

Schwartz also conducted reflection sessions with the students to help them process what they were learning throughout the project.

"It gave them an appreciation for how lucky they are today," Schwartz said of the students, who she said have been very enthusiastic about the program.

She added that, for most of the students, it's the first time they've had the opportunity to ask a survivor whatever they want.

Often, Schwartz finds students will ask about their daily life as Jewish children before the war, and many are surprised to find out how similar the survivors' experiences are to their own.

"All of a sudden they find they can relate to each other in a way that they never thought possible before," she said.

The culmination of the project is the production of two films. One is an amalgamation of the students' edited interviews with the survivors, and the second documents the process of Names, Not Numbers.

The latter shows the training the students received, clips from their interviews and personal reflections on the impact of the program. The DVDs are archived at the National Library of Israel in Jerusalem.

For Rosenberg, recording the memories and forging lasting bonds between the students and the survivors is an integral part of Holocaust remembrance and education.

"We continue to grow and build, but we do not forget."

VISITING OUR ROOTS
70 years ago we were expelled from Apt.
Oct. 17-25, 2012 we return.

Join us, the children of Holocaust Survivors, as we travel to Poland this October. 70 years after the Nazis expelled our parents from the town of Opatow (Apt), we return as a group, to show our solidarity and pay tribute to those who survived and those who perished in the Shoah.

This professionally organized guided-tour includes Warsaw, Treblinka, Sandomierz, Opatow, Krakow & Auschwitz/Birkenhau, with opportunities for optional day trips to shtetlach in the Kielce region. (Chmielnik, Staszow, Ostrowiec & others)

We welcome participation of individuals interested in this experience

The goals of life

Rabbi Meir Rosenberg

Rabbinic Reflections

As summer approaches, many of us look toward a well-deserved vacation. But, summer or not, we are constantly faced with decisions that we prioritize according to a reward value.

Judaism teaches us, however, not to be judgmental about opportunities to do a good deed, since we don't know which will bring us the greatest reward. Pirkei Avot, Ethics of our Fathers, traditionally studied during the summer months, teaches that sometimes the smallest mitzvah challenges can bring us the greatest rewards.

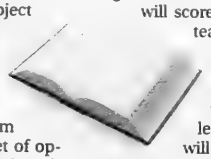
Rabbi Sholom Swadron, a charismatic rabbi whose stories have been told worldwide, once had an encounter with a student that illustrates this concept. Rabbi Swadron would befriend his students and listen to their concerns with genuine warmth. In response, most of them became devoted and attended his daily classes without fail.

At one class, Rabbi Swadron noticed the absence of a diligent student. The rabbi thought perhaps he was not feeling well. But when the boy failed to show up the following morning, and the next, he decided to pay the student a visit.

The student was visibly shocked to see his teacher. He thanked the rabbi and said he would return to school early the next week. The rabbi replied that he trusted the student's judgment but felt that there was something more, and asked him to come clean.

Embarrassed, the student said he was in a soccer league playoff that week. Not familiar with the game, the rabbi asked the student to explain. This must be very important since he was missing class.

The student explained that there are two teams and the object of the game is for one team to kick the ball into the net of opposing team. The rabbi didn't understand – anyone can kick a ball into a net. The student replied that there is a goalie.



How it is possible for anyone to kick the ball into the net with a goalie standing in front? the rabbi asked.

That's the whole point, the student exclaimed. And when they succeed, they feel a tremendous sense of satisfaction and the crowd gets up and cheers.

The rabbi offered this suggestion: why don't the players wait until the goalie gets tired and goes home?

Sighing, the student explained that the challenge is to kick the ball into the net when the goalie is there, when it's hard to do so. That's what makes it exciting.

At this point, the rabbi jumped up and exclaimed: "Exactly! The real challenge is to come to class this week, when the 'goalie,' the yetzer hara [evil inclination] is doing his best to get in your way and stop you. If you manage to kick the ball into the net, you will score points and lead your team to victory. But if you put off coming to class until next week, when the 'goalie' is gone, when it is not a challenge for you, then you will have missed the whole point of the game! You will be kicking a ball into an empty net!"

We, too, are challenged by what we sometimes feel are unimportant issues. But this is precisely the time to overcome those feelings because ultimately that is when the rewards are the greatest. And that my friends, should be one of our goals in life.

The sad case of Lynden Dorval

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

There's no higher form of tzedakah than providing employment for others. Those who are under- or unemployed don't only lose the ability to be self-supporting. Even more devastating is the emotional and social toll that's likely to occur.

Firing someone is a step that must be undertaken with the utmost of gravity. This is especially true when dealing with long-term employees. It's for this reason that long-term employees are (and if they aren't, likely should be) given the option of resigning. Saving face can be a fine strategy when dealing with difficult situations.

In general, Jewish law accepts the notion that an employee does not have a right to "tenure," yet that doesn't mean they can be fired at will. Rabbi Moshe Feinstein went so far as to rule that a competent, but not spectacular, employee may not be dismissed in order to be replaced by a "superstar."

As a teacher, an article in the June 2 edition of the National Post caught my attention. The Edmonton school board has suspended, and is set to fire, a physics teacher with 35 years of experience. His offence? Giving marks of zero for assignments not handed in, tests skipped or exams missed, contravening his school's "no-zero policy."

In days gone by, it was self-evident that not doing work resulted in a zero – a policy still adhered to in the "real world" – but in recent years, there has been a trend to disallow zeros. Students are encouraged to hand in work even if it's months late, with few consequences. Giving zeros, it's argued, just discourages students and turns them off school. If scientific evidence to this theory has been conducted, I have not seen it. In any event, in the case of Lynden Dorval, the teacher on the firing block, evidence exists to the contrary. His zeros motivated students to actually do the assigned work.

As is often the case, the merits of an argument are given little weight, and questions of policy, procedure and employee-employer relations become the central issue in such disputes. And if that's the core issue, then it's obvious the school board has little choice but to discipline him. This might be sad, but it's legal.

While one must admire Dorval for acting with the courage of his convictions despite repeated warnings not to, a school board is well within its rights to dismiss a "defiant" employee.

An employee need not agree with company policy, but not unlike civil disobedience, one must understand that one must "suffer" the consequences of one's actions. It's sad that the net result in this case is likely one that does our students little good and may serve to foster the notion that if students don't work, the teachers will pay the price.

Initiating change in almost any field of human activity isn't easy. And ironically, it appears the more right the cause, the harder it is to initiate such change. Those at the forefront usually pay the highest price, paving the ways for others to reap the benefits of their efforts.

Informative new publications push genre boundaries

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

Not that many years ago, it was impossible to read advanced discussions of issues in traditional Judaism unless you had solid knowledge of Hebrew and Aramaic. But in the last few decades, many of the classics of traditional Judaism have been translated into English, often very accurately. Besides translations, original works that describe, analyze or promote traditional Jewish observance and belief are now written in English all the time.

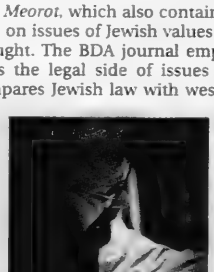
Some of these new English-language books fall into the standard genres of traditional Jewish writing (for example Bible commentaries or codes of law) in everything except for language. Others, though, represent attempts to expand genre boundaries and create new types of works that might appeal to modern sensibilities. Two such works have recently been published.

Rabbi Wayne Allen's latest book, Further Perspectives on Jewish Law and Contemporary Issues, defies easy categorization. It is organized in the style of a traditional book of rabbinic responsa, where each short chapter raises an issue in Halachah (Jewish law), outlines what the classical texts said directly or indirectly about the issue, and then rules on it. Rabbi Allen provides learned discussions about such disparate halachic issues as how many hours before sunset Shabbat prayers may be recited on Friday; whether a synagogue may congratulate in its public announcements a couple that intermarries; whether oral sex is permitted by Halachah; whether you may listen to a radio in your car in a cemetery as you await the beginning of a funeral or an unveiling; whether wedding guests should stand up when the bride or groom begins to walk down the aisle, and other interesting and relevant issues.

What makes this book different from most responsa literature is that Rabbi Allen does not restrict his analysis to works of Jewish law but makes liberal use of works of history and philosophy. With a PhD in philosophy from York University, Rabbi Allen has a gift for making that field understandable to the lay reader. I particularly enjoyed his discussion of the thinking of philosophers such as Hume, Hegel and Kant on the inappropriateness of subjective considerations when deciding issues of law. Rabbi Allen connects this to the oft-heard claim (which he roundly rejects) that people may decide what constitutes work and what constitutes rest on Shabbat on the basis of their own subjective judgements.

A second publication this spring that pushes the genre boundary is the inaugural issue of the Journal of the Beit Din of America. The Beit Din of America (BDA) describes itself as "the most active rabbinical court in North America, providing services to the Jewish community in the following areas: arbitration of commercial, communal and family disputes through the din Torah process;... arranging Jewish divorces through the get process;... resolution of contested get and agunah cases." The BDA should be given credit for its tireless efforts to promote halachic prenuptial agreements, which they use to ensure that recalcitrant husbands give a religious divorce (get) to their former wives.

The new journal is similar to other high-quality English-language modern Orthodox journals such as Tradition, Conversations and Meorot, which also contain essays on issues of Jewish values and thought. The BDA journal emphasizes the legal side of issues and compares Jewish law with western legal systems. Two of the more interesting articles in the first volume are entitled, "Jewish Law, Civil Procedure: A Comparative Study," and "Understanding Rights in Context: Freedom of Contract or Freedom from Contract." But its real innovation is the inclusion of summaries of real cases that were adjudicated by the BDA (disguising the identity of the litigants by using pseudonyms), along with the detailed decisions of the BDA and their rationales.



For example, the journal tells the curious story of a suit filed in the BDA rabbinic court by a kosher chocolate company alleging ruinous competition (hasagat gevul) by another such company that opened up right across the street. The suit was dismissed. The article explains at length the halachic issues involved, in a very readable manner.

While I enjoyed and learned from both these new publications, I could not help wondering how wide an audience exists for either of them, each for a different reason.

Rabbi Allen, who was ordained as a Conservative rabbi at the Jewish Theological Seminary, is a serious scholar of Halachah, but his Conservative background and his many years of service as the rabbi of a Toronto Conservative synagogue means, sadly, that in Orthodox circles, few will read his works. And while some Conservative Jews are interested in reading works of Jewish law, Rabbi Allen's book is to the right of most of the Conservative movement.

The book's longest chapter is a halachic analysis of why women should not count in a minyan. Rabbi Allen explains the faults that he finds in the halachic argumentation in recent Conservative rulings that permit counting them, including the ruling written by Rabbi David Golinkin, president and rector of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Israel. This puts Rabbi Allen to the right of the Schechter Institute, which is generally seen as the most traditional Conservative institution in the world. The Schechter Institute actually was the publisher of Rabbi Allen's first book, Perspectives on Jewish Law and Contemporary Issues (which I reviewed in these pages in 2010). For this book, he has moved to another publisher.

The new Journal of the Beit Din of America may have a slightly wider potential readership. But it, too, raises a question about audience. For 2,000 years, scholars of Jewish law have been writing, always in Hebrew, about such halachic issues as hasagat gevul. Today as well, the grand majority of Jews who are interested in new insights into the laws of hasagat gevul are found in Israel, and very few of them are capable of or interested in reading about such issues in English. If the BDA wants to become part of the ongoing halachic conversation, does it make sense to do so in English?

Self-absorption, expediency give Turkey a free pass

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last September, at the start of a regional "Arab Spring" tour, Turkey's prime minister, Recep Erdogan, spoke in Cairo to a gathering of Arab League foreign ministers.

Firing up his audience, he was met with much applause after declaring: "Israel must respect human rights and act as a normal country, and then it will be liberated from its isolation."

Erdogan's scolding of Israel was nearly matched by his condescension toward Egyptians, who he strongly advised should follow Turkey's lead by entrenching secularism in its yet-to-be-written constitution.

His advice angered religiously conservative Egyptians, in particular the Muslim Brotherhood. Essam el-Erian, deputy leader of the Brotherhood's Freedom and Justice Party, charged: "We welcome Turkey and we welcome Erdogan as a prominent leader, but we do not think that he or his country alone should be leading the region or drawing up its future."

Immediately following Erdogan's visit, the Turkish newspaper Today's Zaman acknowledged the Brotherhood's reaction, adding that "Erdogan's call for a secular order comes as a blow to those who were arguing for years that Erdogan was supporting Sunni elements in the region with the ultimate aim to create Islamist states."

However, critics have argued in recent months that – despite Erdogan's brazen statements – his pro-Islamist party has been moving in an increasingly illiberal direction.

Writing in the Guardian late last year, London-based Turkish academic and human rights activist Ayca Cubukcu pointed to "a growing disjuncture between those who promote modern-day Turkey as a democracy and those who experience Turkey as a land of arbitrary detentions, political repression and military destruction."

She asked why any other country in the region would want to model a state "that imprisons professors, journalists, translators, lawyers, workers, and students and treats as terrorists the members of a political party representing millions of citizens."

At the same time, the Economist magazine observed that the "West does not seem to notice the steady deterioration in human rights in Turkey, instead extolling it as a model for the Arab spring."

Among the signs of deterioration, it noted that hundreds of students had been arrested (and, in many cases, brutally treated) for protesting against Erdogan's Justice and Development Party (AKP). Among other issues, the protesters advocated for the rights of Kurds to be educated in their own language. Sadly, the plight of the Kurdish minority is a massive but largely neglected subject in its own right.

As to illiberal moves under the AKP, consider also the following, just a small part of a growing list:

• The Jan. 2 New York Times reported: "There are now 97 members of the news media in jail in Turkey, including journalists, publishers and distributors, according to the Turkish Journalists' Union, a figure that rights groups say exceeds the number detained in China."

• More recently, the June 2 Times reported from Istanbul that a Turkish court "charged Fazil Say, a classical and jazz pianist with an international career, with insulting Islamic values in Twitter messages, the latest in a series of legal actions against Turkish artists, writers and intellectuals for statements they have made about religion and Turkish national identity."

• On June 4, the Globe and Mail carried an AP story about the anger among many females at what they consider to be Erdogan's retrogressive attitude on women's issues. This includes his view that abortions (which he wants to greatly restrict) and elective caesarean sections are nothing other than "secret plots" against Turkish growth.

What explains the West's avoidance of Turkey's assault on the rule of law? The Economist quoted a European ambassador in Ankara: "Europe is too mired in its own problems and America needs Turkey for regional security" – including its role as a bulwark against Iran's influence.

In short, self-absorption rules on one side of the Atlantic, and expediency on the other.

By-law changes for Baycrest:
By-law No. 6 - 2012 for each of the Baycrest corporations will be presented to Baycrest members for approval. Made in anticipation of the Not-For-Profit Corporations Act, 2010 coming into force later this year, By-law No. 6 reduces the corporate membership to one class: the elected directors. Currently, elected directors are the only members who may vote. The by-law ensures that this continues when the new legislation is in force.

By-law changes for The Baycrest Centre Foundation:
By-law No. 18 replaces the previous By-law No. 17 and includes the following changes. References to the Women's Auxiliary and the Vice-President of Finance are deleted. Inactive standing committees have been eliminated and the Finance and Audit committees have been merged. The Executive Committee membership has been revised accordingly. Minimum responsibilities are specified for Directors. The by-laws further provide that elected directors for 2012 will be elected for a one-year term in preparation for a governance review which may affect the board's structure.

Pencer Brain Trust gala features Joan Jett

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Guests partied to the sounds of Joan Jett & The Blackhearts at the Brain Trust's Rock gala, which raised $400,000 for the Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Tumor Centre at Toronto's Princess Margaret Hospital.

The trust's 12th annual gala held at the Liberty Grand on May 30 "let you embrace your inner rock star, while helping to raise much-needed funds to provide information, treatment and support for brain tumour patients and their families," said Nancy Pencer, president of the Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust.

Holly Pencer-Bellman, the Pencers' daughter and executive director of the Brain Trust, said that "Feb. 3, 2012, marked the 14th year since my dad, Gerry Pencer, passed away from glioblastoma multiforme – the most aggressive type of brain cancer. Gerry was diagnosed in May 1997 with a brain tumour. At that time there were neither support groups nor clinical trials available. There was no consolidation of care.

"His vision was to create a one-stop shop for brain tumour patients and their families: a treatment centre at Princess Margaret that would consolidate all of the treatments, have the best doctors and supportive care programs under one roof."

The Pencer Centre has an international reputation as a brain tumour treatment and research centre, not only for its state-of-the art medical treatments and enhanced patient-centred care, but also as a significant contributor to leading-edge research.

At the gala attended by 800 guests, Harley-Davidson motorcycles added to the rock atmosphere in the Viper Room. Guests who were decked out in rocker attire had the opportunity to purchase "rock box" prizes. For $100, you got a box and inside every box was a prize with a minimum value of $100, ranging from gift certificates to jewelry. There was also a $10,000 cash prize raffle.

The early part of the evening featured Supper Under the Stars for some 200 sponsors who contributed at least $14,000, a performance by Grammy Award-winning singer-songwriter Marc Cohn – who's known for his signature song Walking in Memphis – and a live auction.

Former Pencer Centre patients Lynne Terry and Yves Boucher both thanked the sponsors at the Supper Under the Stars, calling the Pencer Centre an exceptional place that allowed them to be normal and keep on living their lives. "Cancer is a word, not a sentence. The Pencer Centre makes that sentiment real. We're both living proof."

WALK FOR ISRAEL: On June 3, more than 100 walkers raised over $10,000 for the Jewish Agency for Israel's Youth Futures program at the newly revived Walk for Israel in Kitchener. Once an annual event, this was the first time in more than 25 years that Jewish residents from the Kitchener-Waterloo and Guelph areas gathered to walk, eat and celebrate their local Jewish community with friends and family. Pictured are Morgan Norris, left and Ayla Zuckerman.

Montreal mayor to head Israel trade trip

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay will lead a trade mission to Israel this fall organized by the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Montreal.

The goal of the trip, slated for Sept. 10 to 14, is to acquaint participants with business opportunities in the country.

The board cites several factors that make Israel a favourable place in which Quebecers can do business, in addition to being a gateway to the Middle East and Asia.

Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay

It indicates that "Israel is considered one of the most advanced Middle Eastern countries in terms of economic and industrial development…

"The country's economy is stable and mature, and is supported by a tremendous public sector, in addition to a high-technology sector that has kept growing for 10 years," and Israel has the second-largest number of start-ups in the world after the United States.

It's also noted that the rate of investment in research and development is among the highest in the world, and that Israel ranks third in the region according to the World Bank's "Ease of doing business" index.

The mission is recommended for businesses and institutions with innovative products and services.

Founded 190 years ago, the board of trade claims some 7,000 members representing businesses of all sizes. The current chair is Andrew Molson of the brewing company.

Archivists denounce federal budget

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

The scrapping of a federal program that supports small community archives and museums will have a serious impact on the preservation and dissemination of Canadian Jewish historical records, community archivists say.

The Association of Canadian Jewish Archives and Museums (ACJAM) wrote to Heritage Minister James Moore June 4 to protest the elimination of the National Archival Development Program (NADP), effective April 30.

The NADP provided grants of about $1.7 million annually, as well as consultation services, to historical archives and museums across the country, usually those run by ethnic, religious or First Nations groups.

"The NADP is essential to the preservation and accessibility of Canada's community heritage and is especially vital to the health of our country's smaller and cultural archives," the ACJAM members wrote to Moore.

The cut is part of the $9.6 million in reductions to Library and Archives Canada contained in the last federal budget. In early May, Moore defended the cut, saying, "All the services that we operate right now to Canadians will continue, but they'll be done differently."

Moore's press secretary, Sébastien Gariépy, told The CJN the decision to drop the NADP was made by Library and Archives Canada, an independent Crown corporation, and not by the government.

Without addressing the NADP issue directly, Gariépy wrote in an e-mail, "Library and archives has the money necessary to fulfil its mandate."

NADP assistance has allowed Jewish archives and museums to organize their collections, making them available and comprehensible to not only the Jewish community, but, in many cases, the public at large. In recent years, much material has been digitized and described, making it accessible to the world.

These grants have helped support oral history interviews, the preparation of archival material for provincial and national catalogues and databases, the creation of exhibits and educational materials, translations into English or French, as well as put in place the optimal conditions for keeping fragile papers and photographs, the ACJAM told Moore.

"In short, the NADP has opened the doors of our institutions, physically and virtually, to our communities and the general public beyond," thereby promoting understanding between the Jewish and other communities, the ACJAM says in the letter.

The ACJAM members are, in Montreal, the Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee National Archives, the Jewish Public Library (JPL) archives, the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, and the Jewish General Hospital (the medical library and health sciences libraries); the Ottawa Jewish Archives; in Toronto, the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) and the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum; the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada in Winnipeg; the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta in Calgary; the Jewish Archives and Historical Society of Edmonton and Northern Alberta, and the Jewish Museum and Archives of British Columbia/ Nemetz Jewish Community Archives in Vancouver.

Iran denies demolishing military base

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — Iran has denied claims by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) that it demolished buildings at a military base that the agency suspects was involved in nuclear testing.

The Monday report by the state-owned YJC.ir news website quotes Defence Minister Gen. Ahmad Vahidi as saying allegations that Iran was trying to erase evidence at the Parchin military base are "irrelevant and unwise."

The UN nuclear watchdog showed satellite images last month to board-member nations that indicated a clean-up of the site, saying the photos depicted water streaming out of one building, the razing of several other buildings and removal of earth at the facility.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

The activities in the site southeast of Tehran are a recent IAEA concern.

The IAEA presented an image that showed signs that "ground-scraping activities" had taken place at the Parchin facility as well as the presence of bulldozers, according to diplomats who attended a closed-door briefing by UN nuclear agency officials.

The Parchin complex is at the centre of western suspicions that Iran has been developing a nuclear weapons capability despite Tehran's repeated denials of any such ambition.

In related news, Iran said it will not allow the IAEA to visit Iran's Parchin military complex, accusing inspectors of being "western spies."

Iranian lawmaker Evaz Heidarpour told national media that the United States and western countries were trying to gain access to Iran's military secrets by sending representatives of the IAEA to inspect the complex.

"Parchin industries are non-nuclear military industries, and we will not allow western spies to inspect our military technology," he said Sunday, according to the Tehran Times.

The IAEA has insisted on visiting the site in advance of negotiations between the Islamic Republic and the six world powers – the United States, France, Russia, China, Britain and Germany – scheduled to take place in Moscow.

Tehran prohibits IAEA inspection of suspected Parchin site

The IAEA said in a report last year that it believed Iran had built a containment chamber at Parchin in which to conduct high-explosives tests.

In March, satellite images obtained by the IAEA reportedly showed what appeared to be crews and vehicles cleaning up radioactive evidence of tests of a device used to create a nuclear explosion, the Associated Press reported.

Tent cities to be built for Africans

Gili Cohen

JERUSALEM — Israel's Defence Ministry announced last Thursday that it will erect between 20,000 and 25,000 tents for African migrants at various detention centres by the end of the year.

According to an official statement, the Defence Ministry and the Israel Defence Forces will build the tent cities in five different detention centres within a matter of months. Once built, the centres will be run by the Israel Prison Service.

The objective of the plan, according to the ministry, is to ensure that all African migrants who enter Israel will be directly transferred to a detention centre to prevent their entry to Israeli cities.

The plan was presented to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu after his bureau ordered a quick and efficient response to the migrant issue.

The announcement came hours after the Jerusalem's District Court ruled that Israel could deport South Sudanese nationals back to their county.

The court's decision was in response to an appeal by non-governmental organizations representing African migrants. The appeal was filed after Israel's Interior Minister Eli Yishai issued a decision to return the migrants.

Israel recognized South Sudan a day after it officially announced its independence from Sudan last July 9 and initiated formal ties three weeks later.

The decision paves the way for the deportation of about 1,500 South Sudanese who recently entered Israel illegally. Yishai said that he hoped the decision would be a precedent to allow the deportation of African nationals from other countries.

"This is not a war against infiltrators," Yishai said, according to the Jerusalem Post. "This is a war for the preservation of the Zionist and Jewish dream in the Land of Israel."

Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein said last month that South Sudanese could be repatriated to their country now that it has achieved independence and is deemed safe by the foreign ministry. Each asylum application must be considered individually, he added.

The Jerusalem court said that the deportations could commence since the appellants had not proven that the South Sudanese to be deported would face "risk to life or exposure to serious damage."

It is not known when the South Sudanese migrants will be deported. Major violence between Sudan and South Sudan has flared recently, pushing the region to the edge of all-out war, according to news reports.

Speaking in response to the court's ruling, Khaled, a South Sudanese national who has been residing in Israel with two of his children since 2007, said: "I really don't know what to do.

"It's sending people and families to a dangerous place. I'm afraid to go back there with the kids. Will they have a future in such place?" he added, saying that he didn't think he would hide from authorities. "It isn't practical. I have two underage kids. I don't want to do that to them."

The NGOs who had submitted the court appeal responded to the decision, saying they "regret the ruling" and "fear for the safety and well-being of the deportees, especially the children due to be sent to a dangerous place."

Hungarians protest antisemitism

JTA

BUDAPEST — About 120 Hungarians donned paper yellow stars with the word "Jude" ("Jew" in German) written on them and lined up on the bank of the Danube in downtown Budapest to protest recent antisemitic and racist incidents in Hungary.

Local media said the June 7 demonstration was a flash mob organized on Facebook.

The protesters staged the demonstration outside the building containing offices of parliament members.

The state news agency MTI said several demonstrators told its correspondent that even though the Hungarian government had stated that it intends to protect Jewish Hungarians, concrete steps, rather than words, were needed.

One example, they were quoted as saying, would be for the government to back down on including openly antisemitic authors in the national school curriculum.

Earlier this week, the government pledged action after an unknown man swore at an elderly retired chief rabbi and shouted that he hated "all Jews."

The government said it would do "everything in its power to combat words and actions that are incompatible with European norms."

Israel Briefs

Lieberman warned

Israel Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman has been told that he may soon be indicted on charges of fraud, money laundering and breach of trust. The punishment for money laundering alone could be up to a 10-year jail sentence. Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein told Lieberman of the possibility last week, Ha'aretz reported. Lieberman has the right to a hearing in an effort to persuade the attorney general not to move forward with charges. If he takes that option, he won't need to resign from cabinet. If he forsakes it, his political fate isn't clear.

Obama honours Peres

U.S. President Barack Obama was slated to honour Israeli President Shimon Peres with a White House dinner after awarding him the Presidential Medal of Freedom. The dinner, which was to take place June 13, was to have 140 guests, including "former presidents of the United of States of America, secretaries of state, prime ministers and ministers, senior diplomats and senior figures from the arts, culture and economy in the United States," according to Peres' office. Peres was scheduled to spend most of this week in Washington, D.C., and was also slated to meet with Defence Secretary Leon Panetta, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Gen. Martin Dempsey, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Abbas gives warning

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas called on Israel to withdraw from all lands it occupied in 1967, warning a two-state solution may not be on the table for much longer. "I would like to address our Israeli neighbours and say we are seekers of peace and freedom and our people made a major sacrifice when they accepted establishing their state on less than a quarter of the area of historical Palestine," Abbas said in a speech in Istanbul to a conference of the World Economic Forum. "So do not turn your backs on this opportunity," he added. "This opportunity may not stay on the table for a long time, because the region is witnessing rapid developments." Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has offered to restart peace talks, but Abbas has insisted on a full freeze on Jewish settlement construction in the West Bank as a precondition.

Knesset nixes legalization

A bill to legalize West Bank outposts retroactively was voted down by the Knesset. The vote on a preliminary reading of the bill was 69 against and 22 in favour. The legislation would have retroactively legalized buildings built on contested land if the owner doesn't challenge the construction within four years. After the vote, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said that "moving homes from their location, even if it is only five homes, is certainly not an action that this government rejoices in doing. But the court ruled as it did, and we honour the decisions of the judicial system."

Vandals desecrate Yad Vashem

Representatives of the Canadian Jewish community also expressed outrage at the vandalism.

Fran Sonshine, chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, was jolted by the news from Israel on Monday morning.

"I, too, am shocked and horrified by this act of vandalism. To think that a place of remembrance and memory could elicit such hatred and ugliness is devastating," she said. "The mission for which Yad Vashem, Jerusalem and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem stand will continue with strength and vigour. We at the Canadian Society will not allow hatred to derail us from our mission to spread the legacy of the Holocaust, as we disseminate the message of tolerance and compassion for others worldwide."

David Koschitsky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, called the crime an offence.

"The first is against the victims of the Shoah, both those who perished as well as those who survived. But it is also an affront to the Jewish people and the Jewish state," Koschitsky said. "Only those whose views cannot be sustained or defended in the light of day could descend to so cowardly an act as defacing a monument that has become synonymous with the imperative to bear witness and remember the Holocaust."

A crew of workers had power-washed the graffiti off the memorials by Monday afternoon Israel time.

Meanwhile, a car in an Arab neighbourhood in Jerusalem was also vandalized on Monday with the word "Ulpana," referring to the controversial neighbourhood in the settlement of Beit El, which was built on privately owned Palestinian land.

Vandals also punctured the tires of seven cars owned by Israeli Arabs in the neighbourhood.

Jerusalem police said that according to an initial investigation, the graffitti at Yad Vashem and on the vandalized cars were unrelated.

French politician to sue Jewish philosopher

JTA

AMSTERDAM — A lawyer for Marine Le Pen said the leader of the French far right will sue French Jewish philosopher Bernard-Henri Levy for libel.

Wallerand de Saint-Just said he would submit a libel suit on behalf of Le Pen, president of the National Front party, to the Paris Magistrate's Court next week. Levy in an article originally published on the website La Regle du Jeu had suggested that Le Pen may bear some responsibility for attacks against Jews because of her alleged penchant for habitually mocking Jewish-sounding names in meetings.

Referring to a recent attack at Villeurbanne in which three young Jewish men wearing kippot were attacked by about 10 assailants, Levy asked, "Is it really a coincidence that this aggression follows a campaign in which one candidate, Ms. Le Pen, has systematically lampooned Jewish-sounding names in meetings?"

De Saint-Just told JTA that "there is no basis to the claim that Ms. Le Pen jeeringly uses names of Jewish people in meetings and speeches or any other fora. Mr. Levy is simply inventing it." He added: "Suggesting Ms. Le Pen bears responsibility for the attacks in Villeurbanne is particularly ignoble."

The article by Levy, which promises to offer "the key to understanding the new antisemitism," was disseminated by CRIF, the umbrella organization of France's Jewish communities.

Mubarak reported to be in a coma

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAIRO — Former Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak has slipped into a "full coma," CNN reported the Egyptian Interior Ministry as saying on Monday.

Egyptian security officials said that Mubarak's health has deteriorated, with doctors having to use a defibrillator twice on the weekend and feed him liquids intravenously.

Agence France Press also quoted a ministry source as saying Mubarak's "heart stopped twice. Doctors had to use a defibrillator. He has been in and out of consciousness and has been refusing food."

Hosni Mubarak

The officials said Mubarak's two sons, one-time heir apparent Gamal and wealthy businessman Alaa, were at his side in the intensive care ward of Tora Prison hospital south of Cairo, where the 84-year-old former president is serving a life sentence.

The officials, who are at Tora, did not confirm whether the defibrillator was used because Mubarak's heart had stopped or to remedy irregular heartbeats. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media.

Kosher slaughter tiff in Holland

JTA

AMSTERDAM — Dutch Agriculture Minister Hans Bleker signed an agreement with Jewish and Muslim religious leaders and slaughterhouses that will prevent a ban on ritual slaughter.

Under the agreement signed last week, animals can continue to be ritually slaughtered as long as they lose consciousness within 40 seconds of their throats being cut. After 40 seconds they must be stunned, which is prohibited under Jewish and Islamic law. A Dutch rabbi, however, criticized the covenant as "unacceptable."

"The government is concerning itself with issues such as how to perform the cut. That is the domain of rabbis and the Jewish community," Lody van de Kamp, a rabbi and politician, told the daily Reformatorisch Dagblad.

The agreement comes following Animal Rights Party leader Marianne Thieme's withdrawal in December of a bill that would have required stunning of all animals before slaughtering.

Van de Kamp represents the Council for Ritual Slaughter, a small haredi group. His organization was not involved in signing the covenant. The Jewish community was represented there by NIK, the Organization of Jewish Communities in the Netherlands. NIK said the agreement is satisfactory to virtually all parts of the Jewish community.

'Dismal scientists' see an economy under pressure

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If the 400 supporters of Jewish Vocational Services Toronto (JVS) were hoping to hear a stirring, optimistic forecast about Ontario's economic prospects, they may have left the organization's "strictly business" luncheon a little disappointed.

Thanks to a crisis in the Eurozone and muted job recovery in the United States, Canada's economy is facing "uncertainty and headwinds," said Sherry Cooper, executive vice-president and chief economist at BMO Financial Group.

Cooper, winner of the 2010 Lawrence Klein Award for U.S. forecasting and accuracy, said that while Canada is considered a safe haven for foreign investors, Ontario and Toronto are facing "tremendous challenges within the global economy."

The global economy is fragile and uncertain, she said. Speaking the day after a huge sell-off in global markets, Cooper said the U.S. economy remains unstable with "muted" job creation.

The Canadian dollar had slipped to around 96.5 cents, a development that is "negative for our stock markets and macro-economy," she said.

"That means employers will be more hesitant in hiring new workers."

Unemployment in Toronto sits at 8.4 per cent, while in the rest of Canada the rate is 7.3 per cent.

Turning to Europe, she said that continent is being buffeted by troubling developments – Spanish banks are insolvent and the country's housing sector is facing a crisis whose impact will be double that of the housing crash in the United States.

Canadian banks, in contrast, have prospered and are seen as the strongest regulated banking sector in the world, she said.

Speaking directly following Cooper, Avery Shenfeld, managing director and chief economist of CIBC World Markets, asked the audience, "Did Sherry scare you?

"Economics is called the dismal science, so it's our nature to be worried," he said.

Channelling Charles Dickens, Shenfeld said it was neither the best of times, nor the worst of times, but rather it's now "the mushy middle."

Economists are justly concerned about a European bank crisis and over a slowdown in the Chinese economy. China is an important market for our raw materials, so a slowdown there would affect Canada, he suggested.

Concerns that the United States may raise taxes and cut spending are keeping him awake at night, he said.

While both he and Cooper agreed that Canada weathered the recent economic storm better than most countries, unemployment for those under 25 remains stubbornly high, Shenfeld said.

Those 20-to-23-year-olds are not "lazy good-for-nothings." They're finding it hard to get jobs, he said.

The Bank of Canada has been keeping interest rates low in a bid to entice Canadians to borrow and spend, but Canadian banks have been careful to lend to those who are able to pay back the loans – a reference to U.S. banks who gave money to borrowers who were not credit-worthy.

Canada is doing better than Europe in bringing down its deficit, but within our borders, Ontario is running large deficit-to-GDP ratios, Shenfeld said.

That means the provincial government is constrained in what it can spend – "the cupboard is bare" – and "expect government restraint to be a bit of a drag on growth."

During a question-and-answer period, Cooper was asked about youth unemployment. She's not as pessimistic as others, Cooper said. Canada will experience a labour shortage in hot sectors of the economy, particularly in resources and technology.

Canadian young people need to be more mobile and move to where the jobs are. And they need to acquire the skills that are in demand. Both she and Shenfeld complimented JVS for helping prepare young people for the job market.

Asked about the "shrinking middle class," Cooper said growth and innovation are the answer. She predicted job growth in health care and in caring for the elderly. "The possibilities for new businesses in those areas are tremendous," she said.

Responding to another question about protecting failing industries, Cooper said, "I don't think we should protect companies that can't compete."

Instead, Canada should focus on innovation, research and development, and investments in value-added businesses, "and that means training people."

Asked about Ontario's prospects, Shenfeld noted that the construction industry in Toronto is booming. The city will continue to be a destination for corporate head offices. To make senior executives comfortable, funds have to be invested in infrastructure, he said.

Amanda Lang, senior business reporter for CBC News and co-host of The Lang & O'Leary Exchange, MCed the event.

The program included the presentation of awards to D + H Limited Partnership, Tina Green, Jonathan Joblonowski, Eddie Lee, and to Brad Shaw and Hugo Pereira on behalf of Winners Store 226 and Winners/HomeSense 203/010.

Young-adult novel set during the Inquisition

Joseph Serge
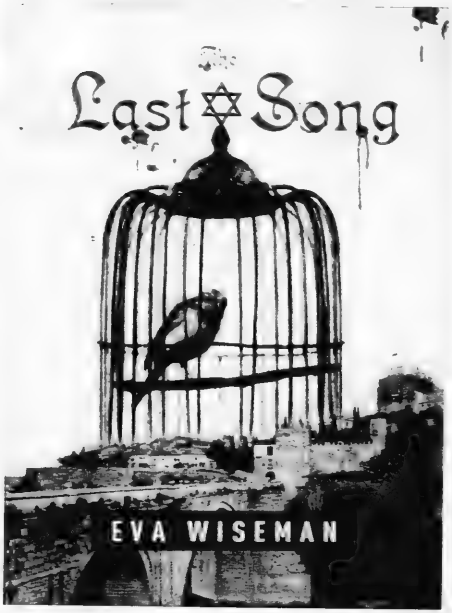
Arts Editor

In The Last Song (Tundra Books), Eva Wiseman's latest novel for young adults, the reader is taken to mid-15th century Spain at the height of the Inquisition.

Isabel is a 14-year-old girl, the daughter of the physician to Queen Isabella.

She arrives home one day to find out her parents want her to meet a prominent Spaniard man, Alfonso, and his son, Luis, whom they want her to marry.

Isabel is horrified. She was always told she'd be allowed to pick her husband and wasn't expecting to be engaged for at least another year. In addition, we learn that Luis is rude, dismissive and cruel "with roving hands."



Isabel begs, cajoles and rages, but her father remains deaf to her pleas. "There is no doubt about his lineage," her father says mysteriously.

The Hungarian-born author, who now lives in Winnipeg, is very economical with her words, and it doesn't take her long to get to the crux (pun intended) of her story.

Right within the first few pages, just after Isabel gets her palm read predicting "unhappiness and hard times," as she is walking home through the crowded market square, the Grand Inquisitor himself leads a procession through the crowd.

Wiseman describes this scene vividly. Torquemeda is followed by four solemnly chanting monks holding crucifixes and then by a long row of dirty prisoners. First a group of women dressed in ragged yellow sackcloth tunics – sambenitos. Then another group of women, these in black sambenitos with tall mitres on their heads.

Behind them were men also dressed in yellow or black sambenitos.

As they walked along, people yelled insults and threw animal blood and other rubbish at them.

Isabel is horrified by the scene in front of her and feels sorry for the victims. But her slave, Sophia, admonishes her, telling her that these people were Marranos, Conversos who practiced Judaism in secret and deserved to be punished.

The stage is thus set. When we learn in the first chapter that her mother never cooks pork or that Isabel has to take her bath on Fridays before sundown, the reader should not be too surprised with the big revelation in the third chapter, especially after she overhears Luis' slave telling Sophia that the "Inquisition will come for your mistress one day."

After her engagement party, her parents reluctantly explain that their parents were Jews forcibly converted to Christianity, but they still practise the old ways in secret. "In our hearts we are still Jewish."

Isabel, who goes to church and prays as much as any devout Christian, is horrified that she belongs to an accursed, greedy race, such "loathsome creatures" who are forced to wear special badges to identify them in public.

Just 14, she is betrothed to a boy she detests and doomed to burn in hell for all eternity. And teenagers today think they have issues.

Wiseman, a finalist for the Governor General's Literary Award for Kanada and the winner of the Geoffrey Bilson Award for Historical Fiction, does a decent job of introducing young readers to the tumultuous world of 15th-century Spain. She describes the auto-de-fés, the public burning of heretics, and touches on important historical events such as the Expulsion and the Reconquista.

But it's not without some clichés. Isabel's fiancé, Luis, is somewhat of a caricature of a villain.

Most characters are either black or white, either very good or downright evil. While the character of Isabel is well written as a confused teenager, praying to the Virgin on one hand, while learning Torah on the other, there is otherwise little depth and readers may not easily identify with her.

But despite these minor flaws, there is much to recommend. Teenagers will learn a lot about this period in history from The Last Song, and learn that the Holocaust was not an isolated event and had its roots in centuries of European antisemitism.

Film sheds light on Johnny Cash's Jewish manager

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

It was never easy managing Johnny Cash, but it was even harder for a Jew from London, Ont.

The story of the country music legend's rise, fall and resurrection as a born-again Christian while being managed by his increasingly reluctant Canadian Jewish manager, Saul Holiff, will première as a feature-length documentary film this weekend.

My Father and the Man in Black makes its Canadian première on June 15 at the Toronto Underground Cinema (186 Spadina Ave.) at the North by Northeast (NXNE) festival.

The documentary, directed by Holiff's eldest son, Jonathan, sheds a bright light on the events surrounding Cash's tempestuous early career, which was fuelled by alcoholism, womanizing and drug addiction.

Jonathan used never-before-heard audiotape recordings featuring interviews and dialogue between Cash and the elder Holiff – Saul kept a secret audio journal throughout his life – in the film. The existence of the journal was revealed by Saul's wife, Barbara, to her children only after his death. In the documentary, Jonathan paints a picture of both a business relationship and a friendship that spanned a decade filled with strife.

More than that though, the documentary is Jonathan's quest to discover, understand and make peace with memories of an often absent and mostly abusive father. While Saul managed Cash, Saul spent most of his time on the road with Cash and other artists he was managing. As well, Jonathan was estranged from Saul during the last 20 years of his life.

Saul Holiff committed what the film describes as "rational suicide" in 2005. At the time, it had been more than 30 years since he resigned as Cash's manager and show business altogether.

Over the course of the 90-minute documentary, Jonathan paints a picture of his father as a man who was misunderstood. But the film doesn't tone down or excuse the abuse Jonathan and his brother, Joshua, suffered at Saul's hands and the feelings of abandonment experienced as a child longing for his father.

While the film is a revealing look at the inner workings and concurrent turmoil experienced by both Cash and Saul Holiff during their years together as artist and manager, it is, at heart, a cathartic project for Jonathan.

Speaking to The CJN last week from his mother's home in Nanaimo, B.C., Jonathan said he was excited about the film's Canadian première and opened up about his childhood memories of his dad and Cash.

"Initially, I resented Johnny for taking my dad away all the time. But by the time I was 10 years old, I began to look at [Cash] as a real-life superhero," he said. "He had this magnetism to him."

Jonathan, 45, said that although his parents were Jewish, he grew up in an atheist household and one that was "archetypical" of families of the time: comprising a domineering, bread-winning father and a meek, subservient mother who "tried her hardest" but ultimately failed to stop Saul's abusive patterns toward her children.

In a key moment about his father's decision to leave Cash at the height of the musician's career, a question that hangs over the documentary for most of the film, Jonathan reveals that a rift about religion likely was the last straw.

By the early 1970s, Cash had kicked the drugs and booze and then promptly found a replacement for his addictions: faith.

Cash, a born-again Christian, became obsessed with Jesus and took the opportunity to visit Israel numerous times to walk in the Nazarene's path, record gospel tunes and even film a movie about Christ's life.

At one point, Cash asks Saul whether he believes Jesus is the arrival of the prophet spoken of in the Old Testament. Saul gives an evasive answer, and the relationship between the two is never the same.

To make matters worse, Cash's wife, June Carter-Cash, insinuates at one point that all Saul is concerned about is money. The implication, interpreted by Saul, is that he's become viewed as "the Jew."

He breaks from the Cash camp shortly thereafter and drops out of the Hollywood and music game for good.

Saul's audio diaries also reveal a man who was "more self-aware than I could have imagined," Jonathan said.

The audio diary reveals how Saul regretted his bad parenting and that his work with Cash was robbing him of his time with his family and how the singer's "fundamentalist, Christianity jazz" was eating away at his Jewish soul.

Jonathan said he spoke to Roseanne Cash, Johnny's eldest child, and son John Carter Cash, the sole heir to Cash's fortune, and "received their blessings" to make the film.

Jonathan Holiff will attend the Canadian première of My Father and the Man in Black.

It's a must-see for fans of Johnny Cash, country music historians and anyone interested in finding out just how a Canadian small-town Jewish man ended up managing one of the icons of American country music.

Batsheva troupe returns to Toronto

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Israel's celebrated Batsheva Dance Company, founded by modern dance legend Martha Graham and Baroness Batsheva De Rothschild, returns to Toronto after a long absence.

The company performs during the Luminato Festival for three shows from June 14 to 17, at 8 p.m. at the MacMillan Theatre, University of Toronto. The group will present the North American première of Sadeh21, which was co-commissioned by Luminato and choreographed by Batsheva's artistic director, Ohad Naharin.

Sadeh21, literally translated, means "Field21." It premièred at the Israel Festival in Jerusalem in 2011. A full-length work that runs an hour and 15 minutes without intermission, Sadeh21 features a large company, including 18 dancers from around the world. It shows the complexity of human emotions through a unique movement language called "gaga," which Naharin created. He said gaga is connected to explosive power, strength and stretching.

"Gaga is the movement language that is our daily training and also has a lot to do with how and why we dance," said the Israeli-born artistic director, who came to dance late in life, starting formal training at the age of 22 after completing his army service. The experiences he brought to dance from his youth include sports, gymnastics and folk dancing.

Naharin joined the Batsheva Dance Company as a dancer in the 1970s – the company was founded in 1964 – and also spent 10 months dancing with Martha Graham's company in the United States.

"Gaga is a workout that allows us to identify places of atrophy in our body and change our moving habits and enable us to connect our efforts with pleasure," Naharin said. "It brings to people a new awareness about delicacy, form and helps to give us the ability to laugh at ourselves, because it is about the virtue of being silly and bringing you to a higher place."

Naharin is passionate both about his dancers and their interpretation of his works – wanting them to go beyond what is familiar.

"Sadeh21 is a lot about the tension between elements, the explosive power, and the sublimation of sensuality, volumes, exaggerations and understatements," he said. "Sadeh21 is, to me… the idea when watching a performance is a multi-layer task – it is not about isolating elements from the whole. If you pay attention to the details, you should always connect to the whole. And, that you don't let a point of reference, of what this piece reminds you of, disturb you from having a fresh moment," Naharin continued.

"I think it is a lot about delicacy, something that is not always in your face. It is the ability to see texture, flow of energy, and to identify something beyond the connotations. What I would like to communicate to someone is a very private experience that comes from my language, my passion, my imagination and my skills, and it is all put into what I think is a coherent offering. My wish is people will recognize it in order to feel what they can feel."

The June 14 performance of Sadeh21 is a fundraising gala for the Koffler Centre of the Arts (www.kofflerarts.org). For information about Luminato, visit www.luminato.com. The Batsheva Dance Company's website is at www.batsheva.co.il.

Emerging writer featured in new publication

Michelle Bitran
Intern

About four years ago, Irving Ellman's wife, Peggy, surprised him with a gift that would change his life. She signed him up for a writing workshop.

Ellman, now 63, is an award-winning interior designer. He has been writing poetry intermittently since he was in university, but he has never made his writing a priority.

"It was something that had always been a really important thing to her – she's a fan of my writing," Ellman said of his wife's support.

His enthusiasm for writing renewed, Ellman began penning short stories in addition to his poetry. He continued to go to writing workshops and readings in the Toronto area, until he eventually decided to submit one of his stories for a chance at publication.

Ellman submitted his short story, The Poet's Voice, to Diaspora Dialogues, a Toronto-based organization that supports the development and presentation of literature about the city in an attempt to capture and share the diverse voices that Toronto has to offer. Ellman did not expect his piece to be chosen.

Irving Ellman

"The e-mail started off, 'Thank you for your submission,' and I thought, 'Oh, here's the polite rejection,'" he said with a laugh. The next sentence in the e-mail, however, congratulated Ellman on his acceptance to the 2011 mentoring program.

The program paired him with a professional author and led to the publication of his work as an emerging writer in the seventh edition of Diaspora Dialogues' annual anthology, TOK: Writing the New Toronto. ("TOK" is not an acronym, but a play on words that combines the short form for Toronto, "T.O.," and the word "talk.")

Ellman was paired with Andrew Pyper, an acclaimed author some of whose books have gone on to be national bestsellers in Canada. "That was a great experience," Ellman said of the mentorship, adding that Pyper helped improve his writing without influencing his unique creative voice.

The Poet's Voice tells the story of a teenage boy who, after visiting his ill parents at a downtown Toronto hospital, finds himself drawn to Sam the Record Man, a now closed landmark music store. There, he discovers Leonard Cohen's music, which affects him profoundly.

Ellman said that his stories usually deal with more mystic elements, but that regardless of the storyline, they frequently involve Jewish themes in a subtle way.

"Even the ones like The Poet's Voice, which are a little more concrete, deal with themes that I think come from that heritage – they are themes of struggle," Ellman said, elaborating that the struggles he writes about are often for dignity, identity and even survival.

"The earliest stories I remember, obviously, were the stories from things like the seder," he said, recalling the times he asked the Four Questions as the youngest son in his family.

The Poet's Voice is Ellman's first published work. It was released in May in TOK: Writing the New Toronto – Book 7. "I have to admit that when I [went to the launch], one of the first things I did when I picked up a copy was to look at the preface," said Ellman, explaining that he was hoping to find his story mentioned along with some of the others that might have been considered more powerful. He was stunned to see his short story quoted in the preface.

"It's a very satisfying feeling," he said of seeing his words in print, adding that he is still getting used to the idea. His second published story will shortly appear in the Canadian Writer's Journal Choice Works collection.

Though Ellman is still at the helm of his interior design firm, he is hoping to find more time for writing in the years to come. "My ultimate goal is to spend more time writing than working."

Island Yacht Club celebrates 60th anniversary

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A couple of weekends ago, Commodore David Baskin anchored his boat in Toronto's inner harbor, sat back and watched other boats sail by. As they did, they dipped their sails in salute.

The Sail Past is an annual event at the Island Yacht Club (IYC), but this year it had added significance. Not only does it mark the official start of the boating season, but this year it was part of the celebrations marking the 60th anniversary of the Island Yacht Club.

The Sail Past was followed by a reception at the club, located on Mugg's Island, attended by numerous dignitaries. MPP Monte Kwinter, himself a member of the club, brought greetings from Premier Dalton McGuinty, while the club's two surviving original members, Cecil Yolles and Richard Lorie, hoisted the Canadian flag on the club's premises.

As part of the celebrations, longstanding member Hartley Robins and his wife, Brooky, prepared a historical exhibit for members, reflecting the club's storied past.

Members gathered for a commodore's ball, part of the official launch of the season, and they watched historic videos of the club's early days on the Toronto waterfront.

Rounding out the celebrations was the creation of a "burgee flag" that each boat will fly, noting the club's "60 years on the lake."

Robins, a member since 1956, recalled that the IYC was started because Jews at the time were not accepted as members by other sailing clubs. A small number of sailing enthusiasts, and others who were looking for a country club experience, launched the club in 1951.

Their first year on the water was 1952, hence the 60th anniversary.

There were about 15 to 20 members at first, but it quickly grew. A membership drive attracted many "social members" who didn't know a bow line from a bagel.

With jib and mainsail unfurled this boat plies the waters of Lake Ontario.

Families enjoyed the swimming pool and tennis courts in a beautiful setting, Robins said.

At the time it cost only about $50 to join and a few years later the price was still an affordable $75 to $125.

The club quickly grew to 300 members and then 350.

The established clubs didn't know what to make of the Jewish sailors.

"We were still looked upon in a different light – they didn't think we knew how to sail," Robins said.

"It was decided to go into racing classes. We had a very active racing group at that time," he continued.

Sailing 5.5-metre boats and Olympic class vessels, the IYC sailors "concentrated on racing fleets and did very well in them."

IYC sailors Mel Gould and Jerry Conway teamed up with a friend who sailed at the Royal Canadian Yacht Club to represent Canada at the 1960 Olympic Games in Rome, though they didn't do too well, Robins said.

Back in those days, the club was the place to be. The Murray Alter Orchestra was the house band, playing twice a week. There were fashion shows, a thriving children's playground, a "tweener" group for kids in their early teens. "It was always a family club," he said.

The IYC has had its ups and downs over its 60-year history, but it remains a going concern, said Baskin.

In June 2004, the IYC suffered a major setback when its clubhouse caught fire and burned down.

"The fire was a devastating blow for the club," acknowledged Baskin. "We lost the historic clubhouse and memorabilia, and some members did not come back."

With no locker room or dining facility, the club operated out of tents and many members who used to take advantage of the fine dining, Friday-night dinners and other activities looked elsewhere.

"We lost members who never came back," Baskin said, even after the IYC constructed an award-winning clubhouse. "The club has not achieved the membership levels it had before the fire."

Prior to the fire, IYC boasted 110 boating members and 40 social members (memberships are based on family units). That worked out to about 300 to 400 people. Currently, the club has 80 boating members and 25 social members.

In many respects, the IYC offers the same sort of premium qualities it once did, with a beautiful clubhouse in a gorgeous setting, as well as a renovated pool, tennis courts and a strong kitchen.

"We think it's a great, undiscovered jewel, but we're not successful in getting the news out," Baskin conceded.

The club has hired a public relations firm to help it make a pitch for new members. Fees are competitive, Baskin said, with social memberships running at $2,100 per year and boating memberships costing $3,495 per year. In addition, a $4,000 initiation fee is payable over four years, he said.

"We'd love to have more members. We think we offer a tremendous experience for a very reasonable price," Baskin said.

Book awards honour nine authors

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Eli Pfefferkorn says he was walking in the park one day, thinking about the story he had been longing to tell, when suddenly he experienced a rare and startling revelation.

"I found the voice," he said. "One day, one morning, I heard the voice from inside coming… a voice I had not heard before." That moment, he knew he could write the story – and he did. On June 7, the Toronto author won a Canadian Jewish Book Award for the result, a Holocaust memoir titled The Muselmann at the Water Cooler.

Nine authors in all were honoured last week at the 24th annual Helen and Stan Vine Jewish Book Awards ceremony, which drew a near-capacity crowd to a handsome hall at the Toronto Reference Library.

Prize recipients included David Bezmozgis, whose novel The Free World took the fiction prize; Fraidie Martz and Andrew Wilson, joint authors of A Fiery Soul: The Life and Theatrical Times of John Hirsch (biography prize), and Rebecca Margolis for Jewish Roots, Canadian Soil: Yiddish Culture in Montreal, 1905-1945 (Yiddish literature prize).

While most of the proceedings were in English, the linguistic flavour of the nation's Jewish community was given full range during the evening. Margolis and others dipped into Yiddish, and recipients of awards for two French-language books made some remarks in French. As the evening's host, CBC Radio personality Michael Enright observed, it was the first time the awards committee had bestowed a prize on a book written in French.

Author Denis Vaugeois won the history prize for Les Premiers Juifs D'Amérique, 1760-1860, a richly illustrated book that chronicles the history of the legendary Hart family of Quebec. The other French-language winner was Richard Marceau's Juif, Une histoire québécoise, a book that shatters many common myths held by the Quebec public about Jews. (Both books are now also available in English translation.)

"My book is an attempt to explain one people I joined – the Jewish people – to the people I was born into, the Québécois," said Marceau, a lawyer and former Bloc Québécois MP.

"You can't help but be amazed by the breadth and the depth of the growth of Canadian literature in general, and Jewish writing in particular," said Enright.

"What is even more exciting than the exponential growth of North American Jewish writing is the generational aspect of it all. The epic era of Bellow and Malamud, Singer and Mordechai Richler is giving way to a new wave of young talents rising to take their place."

Other winners were Lesley Simpson, who received the youth literature prize for Yuvi's Candy Tree; Kalman Weiser, for Jewish People, Yiddish Nation – Noah Prylucki and the Folkists in Poland (scholarship prize); and S. Weilbach for Singing from the Darktime: A Childhood Memoir in Poetry and Prose (poetry).

A special lifetime achievement award went to the Azrieli Foundation for its publication of hundreds of memoirs by Canadian Holocaust survivors. Accepting the award on behalf of her father, David Azrieli, Naomi Azrieli observed that of the more than 35,000 survivors who came to Canada, only about 4,000 are still alive, and the number is dwindling with each passing year.

Lori Starr, executive director of the Koffler Centre of the Arts, which hosted the event, paid special tribute to Helen Redner, who has been director of the Toronto Jewish Book Festival and its predecessor, the Jewish Book Fair, for the past 32 years. For the first time this year, the festival was realigned on the calendar to begin three days before, and culminate with, the book awards.

The festival opened June 4 at the reference library with a $25-a-head evening featuring Shalom Auslander, author of Hope: A Tragedy, being interviewed by local wag and author Michael Wex.

. Nearly two-dozen programs took place over the three days, including several that drew hundreds of schoolchildren.

Pitch for Israel

The rain held off for the fifth annual Scotiabank Pitch for Israel on June 3, when 200 people and 18 teams gathered at the Richmond Green Sports Complex for the charity softball tournament. This year's event, which raised more than $60,000, was organized in partnership with the Jewish National Fund and One Family Fund Canada. Proceeds will go to JNF's educational scholarships for the children of the prison wardens killed in the 2010 Carmel forest fire, as well as One Family Fund's summer camp program for young Israeli victims of terror. Pictured are the top fundraisers for the event, from left, Lisa Boltman, Hailey Goldberg, Marc Berger, Michael Grossman, Justin Shulman, Joel Goldberg and Aaron Rosenthal, with Pitch for Israel's communications director Kortney Shapiro and Pitch for Israel founder Daniel Warner.

Dustin Pollack
Special to The CJN

Bram Gonshor's reaction to meeting for the first time was probably the same as it would be for any fan of the comedian turned talk-show host – nervous and maybe a little bit star struck.

Gonshor, 22, admits he watched Fallon on Saturday Night Live for years and then on Late Night with Jimmy Fallon, when the show debuted in 2009.

As the music intern for Late Night with Jimmy Fallon, Gonshor spent the past four months working with one of his childhood idols.

"All of a sudden its rehearsal time, and he comes in and says, 'What's your name and where are you from?'... Someone I've watched on TV for so many years is just there right beside me, and it was such a bizarre moment."

'I've had these two ideas in my head – you can go into television [or] you can go into music'

Gonshor's role as a music intern included anything from standing in during rehearsals and preparing contracts for bands that appear on the show to working closely with the music co-ordinator on the set doing sound checks.

It's not exactly a glamorous job, but Gonshor says people's eyes open a little wider when he tells them where he's been working.

The Toronto native knows opportunities like that don't come often, so he hasn't taken any part of the experience for granted.

The recent Ryerson University grad spent the last four years studying radio and television arts, and he's always wanted to find a way to mix his love for television and music into a career.

"I've had these two ideas in my head – you can go into television [or] you can go into music," he said.

He said at Ryerson he was taught that you couldn't really do both at the same time. But one night, as Gonshor was surfing the Internet, he came across a band that had appeared on Late Night with Jimmy Fallon.

"I said to myself, 'Someone must book these bands that come on the late-night shows.' So I started looking around at who books the music for Late Night with Jimmy Fallon, and I found this guy named Jonathan Cohen who is the music booker for the show."

Gonshor said he Googled Cohen's name, found his e-mail address and sent him a note saying he was interested in interning for the show.

"I heard back from him a month later, and he said he had forwarded my e-mail to the internship co-ordinator. I kept in touch with him for about a year, applied for the internship in November and here I am now."

As a music buff, Gonshor says the entire experience has been invaluable and is something he'll always remember. About two months ago, the show had a Bruce Springsteen week, which included performances from Springsteen himself, as well as other artists doing covers of his songs.

At the end of the week, Springsteen came back on the show to do a finale performance with The Roots, the show's in-house band.

"You know they call [Springsteen] the boss, but I actually got to see him be the boss," Gonshor boasted.

"When they were rehearsing [for that finale performance], he was telling the band... 'This is what we're doing and I'm going to jump off the stage at this time, and then we're all going to move here, and then the crowds are going to come down,' and if you watched the performance, that's exactly what happened.

"It was really a spontaneous moment that I got to witness, and it was one of the best music performances in television history I'd say."

Gonshor, who headed back home to Toronto earlier this month, said he's hoping to use some of the contacts he's made to find a job where he can again combine his love for television and music.

Reflecting on the entire experience, he now laughs about the nerves he was feeling the first time he met Fallon during the game-show rehearsal.

Though he has never had the chance to sit down and have a one-on-one conversation with Fallon, Gonshor says he was always "super nice" and made sure to say 'hello' if he passed you in the hallways.

"He's just another employee [to me] now. You can't really think of him as a celebrity. If you're star struck all the time, you can't really do your job."

אז אני צפונית

nina.shenhav@gmail.com

"מתי מתחיל הסרט?" טלי שואלת אותי. "בעוד חצי שעה. יש זמן לקפה קצר." אני מרגיעה אותה, כשאנו מתיישבות. "אגב, תודה שאת מזמינה. מזמן רציתי לראות את הסרט הזה. זה מעניין שאת תמיד מאוד נדיבה בימי שלישי." אני אומרת בתמימות לא מסווית

SALTED PECAN BARK

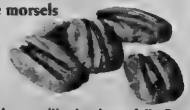
1 – 4.5 oz bar (approx.) of chocolate (60% cocoa)
1 c semi-sweet chocolate morsels
½ c chopped pecans
Sea salt



Cover a cookie sheet or sheet pan with aluminum foil. Break chocolate into heat proof bowl over pot of boiling water (or use double boiler). Top with chocolate morsels. When all of the chocolate is melted, add ¼ c pecans. Stir to combine. Remove from heat and pour onto aluminum foil and spread with a spatula to desired thickness.
Top with remaining pecans. Press pecans gently into chocolate if needed. Let the chocolate cool about 5 min., then sprinkle generously with sea salt. Let cool completely. Break into pieces.

On cjnews.com

The CJN's French-language reporter in Montreal, Elias Levy, writes about:

Herzliah High School students and students from two schools in Haiti who worked together to publish a book about the ways the Canadian Jewish community and Haiti have supported each other.

Hebrew web columnist Yossi Tastassa says that the story of Ilan Ramon is also the story of a nation.

Members of the national assembly from Quebec's three main political parties turned out in large numbers for a wine and cheese reception hosted by the Quebec office of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) at the legislature. CIJA also commended the Quebec national assembly for commemorating the 180th anniversary of the political emancipation of Quebec Jewry in a unanimous all-party motion.

After building an impressive network of institutions and establishing the State of Israel, the time has come for the Jewish People to focus on embracing God, something Jews can "authentically wrap their arms around," says Rabbi David Wolpe, one of America's most prominent Conservative rabbis.

The small but growing Jewish Quebec community of the Vaudreuil-Soulanges region shared its musical tradition with its neighbours at a concert.

One Step Ahead: David Azrieli's story

The book One Step Ahead is about the Canadian philanthropist and developer David Azrieli. It was written by his daughter, Danna, and published by the Azrieli Foundation as part of a program that produces books on survivors.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

One Step Ahead takes the reader through David's life, from the beginning of the Holocaust until shortly after the establishment of the State of Israel. We learn that David was born in 1922 in Poland and that his family stayed in their home even as the Nazis invaded. David, however, did the opposite and crossed into Russia and later Central Asia, constantly strategizing on ways to stay one step ahead of the Nazis

At one point on David's journey, he took a train to Bagdad, where he was to meet a Jewish operative who would help him get to Palestine (the Haganah soldier he linked up with was Israeli military hero, Moshe Dayan). To get to Bagdad, David had to dress up as an Arab. The local security apparatus entered his cabin asking passengers for their passports, a document David did not have. The young Jewish boy had to scramble from car to car to stay ahead of the guards. Eventually, he reached the end of the train, opened the door and scurried up on the roof of the moving train. David crawled along the cars to the front of the train and slipped into the first car. He was safe and soon enough arrived at his destination.

At another point along David's perilous escape, he ended up at a co-operative in the Soviet Union, where he helped, among other things, tend to the horses. One day he caught word that a child was sick and needed medicine. David jumped on a horse, rode it hard to the nearby town and returned with medicines.

On David's return, one of the co-operative's workers told him to leave quickly, as he had run the horse ragged and the members were going to kill him. David exclaimed that he did so to save the little girl's life, but it didn't matter. His life was in danger, and sure enough, as he scrambled to leave the co-operative, he saw members who were carrying axes looking for him. In the book, David says he was disappointed that a culture could put the health of a horse before a child's.

In 1942, David arrived in Israel. After spending time on a kibbutz, he learned his parents, younger brother and sister had been murdered in the Shoah. An older brother survived. On getting the news, he got into bed and stayed there for weeks, tired and feeling very much alone. Eventually, David crawled out of bed. He was healing. He attended the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology and fought in the War of Independence. In 1954, David settled in Canada and became one of its wealthiest and most generous citizens.

One Step Ahead is about a young Jewish man who never gave up on life and who fought like hell to beat the Nazis. A remarkable Jewish man, David figured out, when he was poor and destitute, how to buy the most expensive thing on the market – his freedom and his life.

David just turned 90, and continues to show this tenacity and verve to this day. Happy Birthday, David, until 120. Well done!

Peres receives Medal of Freedom

In a special ceremony last week at the White House, U.S. President Barack Obama presented the Presidential Medal of Freedom to Israeli President Shimon Peres. In receiving the award, Peres said, "It is a testament to the historic friendship between our two nations. I receive this honour today on behalf of the people of Israel. They are the true recipients of this honour. With this moving gesture, you are paying tribute to generations upon generations of Jews who dreamed of, and fought for, a state of their own. A state that would give them shelter. A state that they could defend. Mr. President, you are honouring the pioneers who built homes on barren mountains, on shifting sands. Fighters who sacrificed their lives for their country. On their behalf, I thank America for days of concern, for sleepless nights, caring for our safety, for our future." [Ben Gershom/ GPO/Flash90 photo]

Mein Kampf to be taught in Germany

Toby Axelrod
JTA

BERLIN — Does Mein Kampf belong in German high schools?

With Adolf Hitler's book due to come out of wraps here in 2015, after decades under copyright protection that prevented its publication in Germany, it's a question that is being debated in classrooms and on German TV talk shows.

The discussion has not eased since the Ministry of Finance in Bavaria, which owns the rights, announced plans earlier this year to prepare annotated excerpts for German schools. Scholars at Munich's Institute for Contemporary History are working on the official annotated edition of the approximately 900-page book. Critics say it's better not to play with fire: some youth already have an unhealthy fascination with this chapter of history and don't need further fuel.

But most observers agree that excerpts with expert commentary could help demystify the taboo tome.

Germany's Jewish community has no problem with plans for the new edition. Stephan Kramer, general secretary of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, has said it makes sense to publish the book "to prevent neo-Nazis from profiting from it" and to "remove many of its false, persistent myths."

The move "is absolutely right and overdue," said Julian Barlen, co-founder of the anti-Nazi website Endstation Rechts and a Social Democrat legislator in the former East German state of Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania.

Honorary Degrees

TORONTO — Hebrew University of Jerusalem awarded honorary doctorates on June 10 to Canadian wheelchair athlete Rick Hansen and University of Toronto political science professor Janice Stein, the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University said. Hansen also delivered the convocation address to 2012 PhD graduates. Last year, Hansen signed an agreement with Hebrew U's Institute for Medical Research Israel to broaden its Rick Hansen Spinal Cord Injury Registry, an international database that collects and analyzes information on such injuries and clinical treatments. Stein, founding director of U of T's Munk School for Global Affairs, was cited for forging strong ties between U of T and Hebrew U.

Disability Prize

TORONTO — A project supported by Canadian Friends of AKIM that lets Israelis with intellectual disabilities serve in the Israel Defence Forces has been awarded one of the first $20,000 Ruderman Prizes in Disability by the Boston-based Ruderman Family Foundation. AKIM trains people with disabilities for various roles, and successful participants serve in the IDF. Last year, the Canadian group, established by Toronto's Alex and Olga Eisen, helped AKIM Israel mark 60 years of serving Israelis citizens with intellectual disabilities. AKIM helps more than 34,000 people and their 136,000 family members.

WORLD

Killer's Family Sues

PARIS — The family of radical Islamist Toulouse gunman Mohamed Merah, who killed three Jewish children and a rabbi at a school in Toulouse, France, in March, is alleging French police murdered Merah. On June 11, the family filed a lawsuit accusing police of intentionally killing Merah, rather than capturing him alive and letting him speak. Police shot Merah following a 32-hour standoff at his Toulouse apartment.

Railway Signs Deal

PARIS — The French railway system, SNCF, has signed an agreement with the Yad Vashem Holocaust museum in Jerusalem to increase research into the role the company played in deporting Jews to concentration camps. SNCF will provide the museum with testimonies and documentation on some 80 mass transports of Jews from France. This "strengthens SNCF's commitment to complete transparency, acknowledgment of the past and commitment to remembrance of the victims," said SNCF senior vice-president Bernard Emsellem.

IOC Warns Against Boycotting Athletes

Rachid Hanifi

LAUSANNE, Switzerland — The International Olympic Committee warned that a refusal by any participant in next month's Games to compete against an athlete from a particular country violates its code of ethics.

The warning came June 14 in response to an Algerian kayaker who withdrew last month from a World Cup event after learning that he would be competing against an Israeli.

"Refusing to participate in an Olympic event because of a fellow athlete/team's religion or nationality would not only be unsporting behaviour, but a serious breach of the IOC's Code of Ethics, the principles of the Olympic Charter and the Athletes Oath," IOC spokesperson Emanuelle Moreau said.

She advised athletes who object to "stay at home."

Following the World Cup incident, the head of the Algerian Olympic committee told the Times of London that all Algerian Olympic competitors may refuse to compete against Israelis next month at the 2012 London Olympics. "There is an obligation to ask our government if we have to meet Israel in sport," Rachid Hanifi told the Times last week. Athletes from Arab states and Iran have boycotted Israeli athletes at recent past Olympics.

Teen cancer survivor gives back

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Dundas, Ont., teen Shari Levine understands all too well the urgent need to find a cure for cancer.

Having battled and beaten thyroid cancer when she was just 15 years old, the 17-year-old Highland Secondary School senior has been determined ever since to join the fight against the debilitating disease.

"I knew that from my own experience with cancer it was important to get involved and give back to others. It made me see how terrible a disease it is, and I don't want anyone to have to suffer through it again," Levine said.

"I know so many other close family friends and relatives who have suffered from it and... I want to help find a cure."

Levine was diagnosed in February 2010 and had surgery to remove the tumour just two months later. After undergoing radioactive iodine treatment, Levine was declared cancer-free in June of that year.

While some may have been tempted to put the nightmare behind them and move on from the experience, Levine saw an opportunity to give back.

"My friend approached me about the [Canadian Cancer Society Relay for Life] and asked if I wanted to start a team," she said.

"Soon after, we got a team together which is made up of 17 of my really good friends called Shari's Soul Sisters."

Shari Levine

The 12-hour relay, which has run annually for the past five years at the Ancaster Fairgrounds, brings together teams of fundraisers for the overnight event held from 7 p.m. to 7 a.m. on June 22.

The teams pitch tents and take turns walking around a track, symbolizing the fact that cancer never sleeps.

Participants are treated to live entertainment, games, food and a huge silent auction, as well as a luminary ceremony, during which hundreds of luminaries bearing the names of cancer victims are lit.

"Later in the night, survivors speak, and it's just really emotional and a great time," Levine said.

The first year Levine took part in the fundraiser, she accumulated $13,800 from family, friends and complete strangers who learned about her story.

She was awarded the first-ever Infinite Hope Award for being the highest fundraiser under the age of 18 in Ontario.

Last year, Levine raised $10,200, and this year she's a little more than $2,000 shy of her $10,000 goal.

Determined to reach her goal for a third straight year, Levine stressed that people can continue to donate until the end of July by visiting tinyurl.com/7y57dpk.

In addition to her fundraising efforts, Levine has spent the last couple years acting as a youth spokesperson for the Canadian Cancer Society, which allows her to share her survival story and inspire others.

"I just had a cancer-awareness assembly at my school, where I shared my story and shared a video about my story, and I've travelled to other schools and spoke there for different events," she said.

Building Jerusalem (3)

The location of the historic building in which the Jerusalem Inter-Cultural Center (JICC) is housed is itself a metaphor for the mission and the work of the center itself and its staff.

The center's website describes its location as being "on the seam lines between the city's major identities." The English translation of the idiomatic Hebrew fails to adequately convey the true meaning of the short text.

The JICC is in the Old City of Jerusalem on Har Zion (Mount Zion), part of the invisible weaving of the ancient/modern, multi-communal neighbourhood of Christians, Muslims and Jews that binds the different groups together in a delicate modus vivendi.

The term "culture" in the centre's name, The CJN was told by its director, is a misnomer if understood in the sense of arts and entertainment. Rather, it means different, identifiably distinct, ethnic groups. The centre's mission has many components. But its key purpose is to act as a resource in helping Jerusalem's diverse populations live together peacefully if not always in harmony. Over the years, it has become perhaps the country's pre-eminent instrument for bridging communal gaps, calming roiled communal emotions, bringing clarity to misunderstandings and simply, healing social wounds that arise from time to time in Jerusalem.

The CJN visited the center last month.

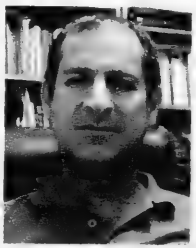
The first observation one makes after meeting its director Hagai Agmon-Snir is how much he resembles writer/actor Steve Martin. The second observation, very quickly after the first, is how interesting and engaging he is. Agmon-Snir is totally and entirely dedicated to finding ways to make the complicated and complex community that is Jerusalem, work. It is therefore, not surprising that the Jerusalem Foundation supports the center and its vital work. For they do share a common purpose.

Agmon-Snir has been the director of the JICC since its founding in 1999. But there are not many clues in his early adult education that would have suggested a career in community "building". Agmon-Snir has a doctorate in Computational Neuroscience from Hebrew University. It was during post-doctoral research at the National Institutes of Health outside Washington that he became interested in issues of multiculturalism. His interest soon developed into devotion. He pursued further graduate studies in the field in Israel focusing on issues of inter-cultural dialogue and protecting disparate group identities. He pointed out to his visitor from The CJN that Canada's enshrinement of multiculturalism as a socio-legal value in the country's constitution was an example of great relevance and hope for Israel.



Hagai Agmon-Snir

The JICC is "a pure NGO", Agmon-Snir emphasized. "The centre is totally non-partisan. It does not receive any funds from any government. It is independent of government."

Indeed, Agmon-Snir explained, a key portion of the centre's mission is actually teaching people how to deal with government. He pointed, as an example, to an especially significant milestone initiative that resulted in the residents of Silwan, the ancient city of David, today an Arab suburb south of the Old City, becoming registered for the program called Tipat Chalav (literally Drops of Milk). It is a community health program of clinic-based care for infants and toddlers. There are many such examples of the centre's interventions.

Because of what it does and more importantly, the way it does its work, never deviating from the sacrosanct rule of honouring the respect and the dignity of all individuals and groups, the centre enjoys great credibility in Israel.

Agmon-Snir and his professional and volunteer lay colleagues educate, instruct, inform and ultimately inspire through the myriad programs and seminars offered by the center aimed at educators, decision makers, policy makers and the "ordinary" citizens and residents of Jerusalem who wish to become involved in the building of their own respective communities. The JICC website lists the full, impressive range of the centre's community building programming.

In the case of this Jerusalem Foundation-supported agency, in particular, it is appropriate to write, "ki miZion tetzeh Torah." For out of Zion (where the JICC is situated) shall teaching (of values of mutual respect and tolerance) emanate.

Liberal interim leader touts two-state solution

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A one-state solution in Israel would be "completely unworkable," said interim Liberal leader Bob Rae, who spoke at the First Narayever Congregation June 10 about Israel and the future of Canadian policy in the Middle East.

Rae, the Toronto-Centre MP who announced last week that he won't seek the permanent leadership of the Liberal party, spoke to about 100 people on behalf of JSpaceCanada, a year-old progressive Zionist organization.

Rae said a one-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict wouldn't work, because each side has a legitimate claim to the land and a one-state solution is "based on a premise that one group of people will be first-class citizens, and other group of people will be second-class citizens.

"Any solution that denies the legitimacy of the other will ultimately prove unworkable. It may last for a while... but ultimately, it will not lead to a more steady and reliable solution."

Karen Mock, who lost her bid to become Liberal MP for Thornhill last year, introduced Rae to speak from the bimah of the downtown Toronto shul, but not before talking about the importance of an organization that lends a voice to the "progressive Zionist" narrative in Canada.

"Organizations like these often describe themselves as grassroots and non-partisan. But JSpace is multi-partisan... We need to let people know who are in government, not yet in government, in the media, that indeed there are multiple voices in the Jewish community," said Mock, a member of the group's coordinating committee.

According to JSpaceCanada's website, the group supports a two-state solution, but opposes Israel's Jewish settlements in the West Bank, as well as boycott, divestment or sanction campaigns that undermine Israel's right to exist.

Bob Rae

Rae, who has served as the Liberal's foreign affairs critic, spoke about "a major shift of opinion within the Jewish community, which has led to the defeat of several very fine and distinguished friends. The ultimate irony is that [Liberal critic for justice and human rights] Irwin Cotler, who is probably the most articulate, knowledgeable, thoughtful, intelligent observer of human rights and Israel's challenges of anyone in Parliament, was being described as antisemitic by the Conservative party."

Rae was referring to the 2009 controversy in which the Conservative party distributed flyers to neighbourhoods with large Jewish populations, including Cotler's Montreal riding, that implied the Liberal party is antisemitic and not supportive of Israel.

The flyers alleged that the Liberals "willingly participated in the overtly antisemitic Durban I," the 2001 United Nations World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa.

"There is far more diversity of opinion within Israel and far more latitude about what can be said and what can't be said... than there is in Canada at the moment," Rae continued.

He explained while it's antisemitic to denounce the existence of the State of Israel, it's not antisemitic to criticize Israel's policies or actions.

During his recent trips to Israel, Rae said, he realized that the debate about the conflict has shifted.

"Within Israel, there is a school of thought that no longer refers to conflict resolution, but refers to conflict management... It means that you're coping, but you're not actually getting underneath to the real long-term prospects that were set out in [the Oslo accords] as the grand objective."

When it comes to debate about the Middle East, it's important not to engage in wishful thinking, Rae advised.

In the Arab world, a common mistaken belief is that "when we find a solution to the conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians... all the other problems in the world will be resolved," he said.

"On the other side, to think that somehow, Israel's experience with attempting to settle and... to continue with the military occupation of certain areas, and to believe that you can carry out that activity and not be subject to the same resentments and sets of issues as every other imperial adventure has experienced in history, is wishful thinking."

During a question-and-answer period, Rae said that Canada has lost a lot of credibility with Arabs and needs to work on regaining it.

"We're not seen as a country that really understands or connects that well to the Arab world," he said.

"I don't think we need to be neutral. I think neutral is a terrible term. I think we need to have an understanding that there is more than one narrative."

Demographics cited for CHAT enrolment drop

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The student population at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto has decreased more than 10 per cent over four years, from a high of 1,530 in 2008 down to 1,369 this year, but director of education Paul Shaviv attributes the drop to post-baby boom demographics, not economic factors.

"I can't persuade parents to have more babies 15 years ago," he said, referring to people born after the mid-1960s. This group, sometimes called Generation X, represents a smaller demographic cohort than so-called baby boomers born after the end of World War II.

Rabbi Scot Berman

TanenbaumCHAT's enrolment drop has meant that it's had to address new financial realities.

For example, some teachers at TanenbaumCHAT have retired or left and haven't been replaced, Shaviv said, declining to specify how many.

Also, he added, in the last couple of years, some probationary teachers that in previous years would have been kept on had to be let go. "We haven't been able to offer them long-term posts."

He said no administrative positions have been affected.

In a little more than a decade, tuition at the school – the largest Jewish community high school in North America – has risen dramatically, mirroring rises in tuition at other Jewish and private schools, but consistently surpassing the rate of inflation. In the past 14 years, TanenbaumCHAT's tuition has doubled: in 1998/99, it was $10,700, just under half what it is today.

This year (2011-12), tuition was $21,500, seven per cent higher than the previous year (when it was $20,100). At the time, the increase was about twice the rate of inflation, which was 3.1 per cent last June, as reported by Statistics Canada.

Tuition for the coming school year (2011-12) is $22,650.

Such high tuition costs for Jewish day school are unsustainable, says Rabbi Scot Berman, headmaster of Toronto's Bnei Akiva Schools – Ulpanat Orot and Yeshivat Or Chaim.

He told The CJN that if tuition is not made more affordable, the numbers of students attending day school "will continue to decline."

He predicted that even in Orthodox schools – where families are more committed to Jewish day school education than their non-Orthodox counterparts – alternatives to "the standard full-day school" will come into play. It's already happening in the United States, he said.

"There will be new models that parents will be willing to experiment with, because of the crushing costs of tuition," Rabbi Berman said.

He cited some American examples: Hebrew charter schools in the public system, and "academies where part of the day's teaching is online."

Technology makes it possible to "escape the need for paying teachers for every actual moment of instruction," Rabbi Berman said.

"There may be cheaper alternatives, but they are not substitutes" for Jewish day school, said Shaviv, who is leaving TanenbaumCHAT this summer to take a position in New York. (He's being replaced for 2012-13 by Rhona Birenbaum, the school's CFO/executive director, who will serve as interim director of education until Shaviv's replacement can be found.)

Shaviv noted that despite the decrease in student numbers, retention of students is "at an all-time high."

As well, he said the school, which is putting $7.5 million into a new science wing at its Wilmington Avenue campus, "has made tremendous strides in independent fundraising" and will continue to increase its income from fundraising.

At Bnei Akiva Schools, there are currently 217 students – 100 girls at Ulpanat Orot, and 120 boys at Yeshivat Or Chaim.

That's down from 238 students three years ago, a drop of nine per cent.

"We basically get more or less the numbers we expect, based on enrolment in Grade 8 in our feeder schools," said Norman Winter, interim president of the school.

Regarding the increased cost of tuition, Winter said requests for subsidies have risen in the last couple of years. "There are more incoming parents asking for subsidies, and also during the school year, parents who had signed up as full fee-paying parents, or who had been accepted at a certain subsidy percentage, have come back during the year and asked for subsidies or increased subsidies. That's relatively new."

In the Orthodox community, particularly the modern Orthodox segment, it's less likely that families will pull out of day schools, but they may have fewer children "because it's so darn expensive to educate their kids," Rabbi Berman said.

Paul Shaviv

Tuition at Bnei Akiva Schools this year was $21,400, but next year's fees had yet to be determined at The CJN's deadline. "One thing I can guarantee you," said Rabbi Berman. "It's not going down."

Winter said that the school hasn't had to let teachers go for budgetary reasons, although some teachers may be teaching for fewer hours than before.

Rabbi Berman's contract has not been renewed for next year, and neither has that of rosh hayeshiva Rabbi Shlomo Gemara. Winter said neither decision was based on finances. Rather, he explained, the school decided, after a study by outside consultants, to adopt a different administrative structure for the coming year.

As of earlier this month, 27 girls and about 20 boys were expected in next year's incoming class, Rabbi Berman said.

Initially, Winter explained, parents "were holding back" until new administrators were named. (The school has since hired Rabbi Yair Spitz as principal of Jewish studies and interim head of school, and Winter said the school was "hopefully close to finalizing" arrangements with a new principal for Ulpana, a position that didn't exist before.)

"We've always had to fundraise," Winter said. "Now there's pressure to raise even more funds."

He added that "all schools look to the community at large to try to get increased funding for education, and that means looking to [UJA] Federation [of Greater Toronto]. They're under pressure as well, and we're very appreciative of what they contribute. We're hoping they can step up to the plate or provide increased funds for the growing gap between what we're able to get in tuition and fundraising, and in order to cover our expenses."

The federation allocates more than $10 million a year to fund Jewish education, mainly for tuition subsidies.

A spokesperson for Bais Yaakov High School for Girls declined to comment on tuition issues, and a call to Tiferes Bais Yaakov, also an Orthodox girls' high school, was not returned by press time.

At Ner Israel Yeshiva College, Rabbi Moshe Friedman, the school's executive vice-president, said numbers have not been affected by high tuition. "Our tuition is lower than most high schools. The parents are already committed... we don't turn away anybody for financial reasons."

In the past, the community has sought – unsuccessfully – to solve the tuition problem by seeking provincial funding for day schools.

But recently, other solutions have been proposed.

In a CJN column last month, Rabbi Jay Kelman, a co-founder of Torah in Motion, wrote that the amount of money currently in Jewish philanthropic foundations is a potential solution, "provided one does not feel that capital must be preserved indefinitely."

To preserve capital, he has proposed that parents be required to buy life insurance plans for less than the cost of one year's tuition, "the proceeds of which would replenish any 'capital depletion.'"

Christian missionaries more visible on the streets

Reva Kaiser
Special to The CJN

Armed with warm smiles, pamphlets and years of training, evangelical Christians are planting themselves in key locations in the city, on the lookout for unsuspecting targets.

There are often two-week spans in the summer when their presence increases, particularly on busy street corners of downtown Toronto.

They aim to connect with the people they meet, even briefly, and then slowly convert them – or their acquaintances – to Christianity through followup contact.

"Because missionaries are on the streets intermittently in the summer, I want to make sure we're prepared with individuals who can be there as a response from the Jewish community," says Julius Ciss, executive director of Jews for Judaism.

To combat these evangelical efforts, Jews for Judaism, the only outreach organization in Canada dedicated to countering missionaries' efforts, is once again gearing up its Rapid Response Unit program.

Made up of volunteers who live and work throughout the city, the Rapid Response Unit aims to counter-leaflet on the same street corners as the missionaries and intercept their efforts, focusing on the people being targeted rather than the missionary.

Donning bright yellow "Jews for Judaism.ca" T-shirts, volunteers are often more noticeable than their opposition and are successful in informing passersby that there is another option to Christianity for those Jews looking to fill a spiritual void.

While Jews for Jesus is one of the most visible missionary groups and whose name has become a catch-all for other similar organizations, there are more than 100 Christian missionary groups in Canada targeting Jews. They know that a sizable number of Jews without religious ties are searching for meaning in their lives or an infusion of spirituality, unaware that it exists in Judaism.

The missionaries don't expect to convert people on a street corner. "They are focused on winning people over in as friendly and as cordial a manner as possible," says Ciss. "They first want to develop a relationship." They make every effort to connect with interested passersby and then follow up later with that individual or his Jewish acquaintances.

Since the missionaries don't broadcast their whereabouts in advance, Jews for Judaism relies on the Jewish public to inform them when missionaries are spotted. They are usually in the downtown core during lunch and afternoon rush hours.

Missionaries also target public Jewish events. This year, 16 missionaries were counted at the Walk with Israel parade in Toronto on Victoria Day, but Jews for Judaism was prepared with their own crew of 24 volunteers, who trailed the missionaries in their sunshine T's emblazoned with the organization's website. The Jewish organization succeeded in attracting attention and raising awareness, and their website hits spiked that day.

Jews for Judaism's website has a wealth of information that can help answer religious and spiritual questions. "People need to know that there's an answer to the missionaries," says Ciss. "We want Jews to be aware that there are Jews who care for them and they must look both ways before crossing the street."

If you encounter a missionary, don't engage him or her, but accept and then forward the materials you get to Jews for Judaism. This helps them identify which proselytizing organizations are operating in the city.

Jews for Judaism wants to increase its base of Rapid Response Unit volunteers and establish a network all over the city. To become a Rapid Response Unit volunteer, visit JewsForJudaism.ca or call 416-789-0020.

In defence of ourselves

This week and next mark the end of the school year for most of our children. Post-secondary students have already completed their academic year. Whether or not students have graduated and are moving on to a new stage in their lives or are advancing "merely" from one grade to the next, whether they have finished grade one or high school, it is a very sweet time of year for most.

School is not always pleasant. But it is always necessary. The school year is long, and always tiring. At all stages and all grades, it holds rewards and disappointments for our children. Self-confidence climbs; sometimes it stumbles. We must not underestimate how much of an achievement it is by our children to complete their school year.

Nor must we fail to acknowledge the profoundly important contribution of our teachers, school administrators and staff in helping guide our children throughout the year. This is true of all children, teachers, administrators and staff in all schools. We commend them all.

But we would be remiss if we did not make special mention of the well-documented worry taking hold in our community, and in other communities as well, over the constantly increasing, already super-high cost of sending a child to a Jewish day school. In the not-distant future, most middle-class parents will be unable to afford day school education for their children. Rather than decide to live perennially in overwhelming debt or to have smaller families, they will simply decide not to send their children to day school.

Chief U.K. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks has eloquently explained why Jewish education and Jewish schools are so important to us.

"For Jews, education is not just what we know. It's who we are. No people ever cared for education more. Our ancestors were the first to make education a religious command, and the first to create a compulsory universal system of schooling – eighteen centuries before Britain… The Egyptians built pyramids, the Greeks built temples, the Romans built amphitheatres. Jews built schools. They knew that to defend a country you need an army, but to defend a civilization you need education [emphasis added]. So Jews became the people whose heroes were teachers, whose citadels were schools, and whose passion was study and the life of the mind."

Reining in if not actually lowering the cost of a Jewish education is a crisis-level problem that knows of no easy solution. But we cannot yet say it is intractable.

We do not point fingers. We extend a hand of concern. We call out to everyone who shares this worry to seek new, as yet untried ways of making Jewish education affordable once again to the "ordinary" middle class family.

Shrugging our collective shoulders in resignation – or worse, disinterest – will have a far-reaching and alas, harmful effect on our collective future as an identifying, aware, Jewish people.

In Rabbi Sacks' words, we must defend our civilization.

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) allocated $1.64 million to Israel's Reform movement after U.S. Reform leaders threatened a partial UJA fundraising boycott. JAFI approved $1.64 million out of $22 million in requests. The money was to help expand the movement in Israel. A Reform leader in Israel called it "the beginning of the Reform movement's entrenchment in Israeli society."

Concert Artist Chat (1)

We went to the Simon Shaheen concert in Koerner Hall at the Royal Conservatory of Music (RCM) on June 1. After intermission, Shaheen was interviewed on stage by the RCM director of programming. Shaheen refused, consistently and stubbornly, to say the words "Jews," "Israel" and "Israelis." He also refused to accept the existence of the State of Israel.

Shaheen said that he went to "Palestine" and visited Haifa and the Galilee, and talked to the local Palestinians (probably meaning Israeli Arabs). He refused to acknowledge that he got to Haifa and the Galilee through the welcoming gates of the State of Israel. Haifa and Galilee are not geographically located within the internationally recognized borders of Israel, but located in a virtual entity called Palestine. The RCM interviewer ignored these "petty" errors and refused to correct false facts, just playing along diplomatically. Then he asked Shaheen if he went to other places in Palestine, such as Gaza and the West Bank. That meant that the RCM accepted, on stage, in front of hundreds of Canadians, the falsified "facts" that Haifa and the Galilee are part of a "Palestine."

We left, saying to the hall: "Bye-bye, we are now going to Haifa, Israel, and then we will go to the Galilee, which is also in Israel. Accept reality, accept reality." We think that a public institution such as the RCM should not allow lies to be said that offend a good friend of Canada's like the State of Israel.

Concert Artist Chat (2)

The Royal Conservatory has just completed its third season of presenting internationally acclaimed artists in Koerner Hall. Occasionally we have added an artist chat to a concert. These discussions are spontaneous, unscripted and unrehearsed, and allow our audience to delve a little deeper into the music and to understand the context within which the artists perform. Having said this, we fully understand that, occasionally, comments may be made that are upsetting to some in our audience and we sincerely regret that this happened to two patrons June 1 at a concert featuring Simon Shaheen, a world-renowned artist of Palestinian descent. While the offended patrons may not have agreed with Shaheen, as is their right, we can assure you that we do not believe that Shaheen was deliberately trying to provoke a political discussion, nor were his comments antisemitic.

This season, we presented a special series of concerts titled "Music from across the Middle East" that featured collaborations between Israeli and Arab musicians. The goal was to create a space where music and art could allow for greater understanding of the people in that volatile part of the world. More than 50 artists from Israel, various Arab countries and Canada participated in a glorious expression of peace and mutual respect. The series was a highlight of our season.

We live in a world filled with the constant "noise" of politics and strident opinion. Music gives us a chance to listen and, perhaps, to understand and respect people from all parts of the world.

Pride Parade

As a queer Israeli-Canadian who is very pro-Israel, I do not see the big deal in letting Queers Against Israeli Apartheid march in this year's Pride Parade in Toronto ("City council condemns term 'Israeli apartheid,'" June 14). There is a little thing called democracy, where different points of view coexist and intermingle. In Israel today, there is a very real debate about whether Israeli apartheid exists. Why is Canada so afraid of this same conversation? Has our Canadian politeness crossed into the realm of censorship? I think so.

Seven principles of Jewish leadership

The phrase "Jewish leadership" is ambiguous. It means leadership by Jews, but it also means leadership in a Jewish way, according to Judaic principles and values. What follows are suggestions for seven principles for leadership done in a Jewish way.

Leadership begins with taking responsibility.

Contrast the opening of Genesis with the opening of Exodus. The opening chapters of Genesis are about failures of responsibility. Confronted by God with their sin, Adam blames Eve, and Eve blames the serpent. Cain says, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Even Noah, "righteous, perfect in his generations," has no effect on his contemporaries.

By contrast, at the beginning of Exodus, Moses takes responsibility. When he sees an Egyptian beating an Israelite, he intervenes. When he sees two Israelites fighting, he intervenes. In Midian, when he sees shepherds abusing the daughters of Yitro, he intervenes. Moses, an Israelite brought up as an Egyptian, could have avoided each of these confrontations, yet he did not. He is the supreme case of one who says: "When I see wrong, if no one else is prepared to act, I will."

At the heart of Judaism are three beliefs about leadership: we are free, we are responsible, and together we can change the world.

No one can lead alone.

Seven times in Genesis 1, we hear the word tov, "good." Only twice in the whole Torah does the phrase lo tov, "not good," appear. The first is when God says, "It is not good for man to be alone." The second is when Yitro sees his son-in-law, Moses, leading alone, and says, "What you are doing is not good." We cannot live alone. We cannot lead alone. Leadership is teamsmanship.

One corollary of this is that there is no single leadership style in Judaism. During the wilderness years, there were three leaders: Moses, Miriam and Aaron. Moses was close to God. Aaron was close to the people, and Miriam led the women and sustained her two brothers. The sages say it was in her merit that there was water to drink in the desert.

During the biblical era, there were three different leadership roles: kings, priests and prophets. The king was a political leader. The priest was a religious leader. The prophet was a visionary, a man or woman of ideals and ideas. So in Judaism, leadership is an emergent property of multiple roles and perspectives. No one person can lead the Jewish people.

Leadership is about the future.

It is vision-driven. Before Moses can lead, he has to experience a vision at the burning bush. There he is told his task: to lead the people from slavery to freedom. He has a destination: the land flowing with milk and honey. He is given a double challenge: to persuade the Egyptians to let the Israelites go and to persuade the Israelites to take the risk of going. The latter turns out to be more difficult than the former.

Along the way, Moses performs signs and wonders. Yet his greatest leadership act occurs in the last month of his life. He gathers the people together on the bank of the Jordan and delivers the speeches that constitute the book of Deuteronomy. There he rises to the greatest heights of prophecy, his eyes turned to the furthest horizon of the future. He tells the people of the challenges they will face in the Promised Land. He gives them laws. He sets forth his vision of the good society. He institutes principles, such as the septennial national assembly at which the Torah was to be recited, that will periodically recall Israel to its mission.

Before you can lead, you must have a vision of the future and be able to communicate it to others.

Leaders learn.

They study more than others. They read more than others. Of the king, the Torah says that he must write his own Sefer Torah, which "must always be with him, and he shall read from it all the days of his life" (Deuteronomy 17: 19). Joshua, Moses' successor, is commanded: "Keep this Book of the Law always on your lips; meditate on it day and night" (Joshua 1: 8). Without constant study, leadership lacks direction and depth.

This is so even in secular leadership. Gladstone had a library of more than 30,000 books. He read more than 20,000 of them. Gladstone and Disraeli were both prolific writers. Winston Churchill wrote some 50 books and won the Nobel Prize for Literature. Visit David Ben-Gurion's house in Tel Aviv and you will see that it is essentially a library with 20,000 books. Study makes the difference between the statesman and the politician, between the transformative leader and the manager.

Leadership means believing in the people you lead.

The rabbis gave a remarkable interpretation of the passage in which Moses says about the Israelites, "They will not believe in me." God said to Moses: "They are believers the children of believers, but in the end you will not believe." They also said that the sign God gave Moses when his hand became leprous (Exodus 4:6) was a punishment for casting doubt on the Israelites. A leader must have faith in the people he or she leads.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks

There is a profound principle at stake here. Judaism prefers the leadership of influence to the leadership of power. Kings had power. Prophets had influence, but no power at all. Power lifts the leader above the people. Influence lifts the people above their former selves. Influence respects people. Power controls people. Judaism, which has the highest view of human dignity of any major religion, is, therefore, deeply sceptical about power and deeply serious about influence. Hence one of Judaism's greatest insights into leadership: the highest form of leadership is teaching. Power begets followers. Teaching creates leaders.

Leadership involves a sense of timing and pace.

When Moses asks God to choose his successor, he says: "May the Lord, the God who gives breath to all living things, appoint someone over this community to go out before them and come in before them, who will lead them out and bring them in" (Numbers 27: 16-17). Why the apparent repetition?

Moses is saying two things about leadership. A leader must lead from the front. He or she must "go out before them." But a leader must not be so far out in front that, when he turns around, he finds no one following. He must "lead them out," meaning he must carry people with him. He must go at a pace that people can bear.

One of Moses' deepest frustrations – we sense it throughout the biblical narrative – is the sheer time it takes for people to change. In the end, it would take a new generation and a new leader to lead the people across the Jordan and into the Promised Land. Hence the rabbis' great saying: "It is not for you to complete the task, but neither are you free to desist from it."

Leadership involves a delicate balance between impatience and patience. Go too fast and people resist and rebel. Go too slow and they become complacent. Transformation takes time, often more than a single generation.

Leadership is stressful and emotionally demanding.

Listen to Moses, the greatest leader the Jewish people ever had: "Did I conceive all these people? Did I give them birth? Why do you tell me to carry them in my arms, as a nurse carries an infant, to the land you promised on oath to their ancestors?... I cannot carry all these people by myself; the burden is too heavy for me. If this is how you are going to treat me, please go ahead and kill me – if I have found favour in your eyes – and do not let me face my own ruin" (Numbers 11: 11-15).

You can find similar sentiments in the words of Elijah, Jeremiah and Jonah. All at some stage prayed to die rather than carry on. Transformative leaders see the need for people to change. But people resist change and expect the work to be done for them by the leader. When the leader hands the challenge back, the people then turn on him and blame him for their troubles. So Moses is to blame for the hardships of the desert. Elijah is to blame for disturbing the peace. Jeremiah is to blame for the Babylonians. No wonder that the most transformative leaders feel, at times, burnout and despair.

Why then do they lead? Not because they believe in themselves. The greatest Jewish leaders doubted their ability to lead. Moses said, "Who am I?" "They will not believe in me." "I am not a man of words." Isaiah said, "I am a man of unclean lips." Jeremiah said, "I cannot speak for I am a child." Jonah, faced with the challenge of leadership, ran away.

Leaders lead because there is work to do, there are people in need, there is injustice to be fought, there is wrong to be righted, there are problems to be solved and challenges ahead. Leaders hear this as a call to light a candle instead of cursing the darkness. They lead because they know that to stand idly by and expect others to do the work is the too-easy option. The responsible life is the best life there is, and it's worth all the pain and frustration. To lead is to serve – the highest accolade Moses ever received was to be called eved HaShem, "God's servant," and there is no higher honour.

The single overarching question of Jewish existence in the modern age is: what is it to live as a Jew in the public domain, in a world without walls? Jews know how to live with poverty. Do we know how to live with affluence? Jews know how to survive persecution. Do we know how to handle freedom? We know how to recognize enemies. Do we know how to make friends?

Never in history has there been a better time to be a Jewish leader. However, there is a right way for future Jewish leadership to go, and a wrong way. The wrong way is to emphasize antisemitism and the assaults on Israel, to exaggerate the tensions between the different streams in Jewish life and to bemoan the lack of Jewish leadership. The right way is to make friends within and beyond the Jewish community, to emphasize the ethical and spiritual dimensions of Judaism, to find social action projects we can work on across other divides and to find ways of making Jews feel proud to be Jews.

Reading Jewish

Perhaps because I'm a professor of Jewish studies, I often meet people who confess to me that they've "matured" out of Judaism or Jewish identity, which they think of as childish affectations. But it's really their childhood Jewish education that was (appropriately) childish, not Judaism and Jewishness.

After all, no one would claim that Einstein's theories are child's play on the basis of having learned math in elementary school, or that great literature is simplistic once you have Dick and Jane under your belt. Relativity? Hah! Piece of cake. I did math in Grade 4! Hamlet? Easy-peasy. I learned to write in Grade 1! And, notwithstanding the Everything I Need to Know I Learned in Kindergarten industry, no one would think that the skills acquired in childhood suffices for the complexity of the real workplace. An audit? No problem. I learned my numbers in pre-kindergarten. But many people expect that the Judaism they learned in their youth will suffice them forever.

In a perfect world, we'd all have the luxury of taking formal classes forever. But even in our time-crunched world, we can carve out spaces and time to challenge and renew ourselves, expanding our knowledge and sharpening our thinking. Especially at this time of year, just as the eased time of summer schedules begin, we can make a commitment to read Jewish: something serious, demanding or thought-provoking, something that speaks to the Judaism, the Jewishness, the Jewish experience of adults.

Once upon a time, it was easy to know what folks were reading. You could see which displays attracted clusters of customers in bookstores. In the subway, at the beach or in a café, you'd see waves of the same cover design, or your eyes would be drawn to something out of the ordinary. You could pick out kindred spirits by the book spines balanced in their hands, or expand your to-read list through the choices of others.

The digital world has changed the lay of the literary landscape. It has given us the twinned gifts of portability and privacy. We can order books from a plethora of online vendors and expect a nondescript brown package to arrive on our doorstep in days. We can embark on far-flung journeys with virtual stacks of books in tow, loaded onto a lightweight electronic reader or tablet. And, unless we tell them, no one has any clue what we're reading, just as we, alas, have no clue what others are reading.

So, I'm telling. Here's a sampling of what you could find on my bookshelves, both actual and virtual, recently read or waiting to be read.

First are two autobiographically based novels by the German Jewish writer, H. G. Adler. Hans Adler, trained as a musicologist before World War II, was deported at age 22 to Theresienstadt and was eventually sent to Auschwitz and several other camps. Soon after the war, he published a massive historical study of Theresienstadt, several novels based on his memories and experiences – more than 25 books in a range of genres. Although Adler died in relative obscurity, lately there has been renewed interest in his writing. New English language translations of his novels Panorama and The Journey have been published recently to critical acclaim. York University's Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies plans to have the first-ever symposium dedicated to his work in the fall.

The peppery stories in Etgar Keret's newly translated collection, Suddenly a Knock on the Door, like all of Keret's writing, is quirky, playful, complex, smart and serious. An Israeli writer who explores the nuances of Israeli culture, Keret has revitalized interest in the short story.

American writer Nathan Englander's new collection, What We Talk About When We Talk About Anne Frank, explores the complexities of identity and relationships in Israel and the United States in a series of masterly crafted stories.

A cluster of superb recent Canadian novels by Jewish writers pulled me into deeply imagined worlds. I'll mention just two: David Bezmozgis' richly conceived The Free World, which follows a multi-generation family of Russian Jews who make their way from the Soviet Union to Canada, and Nancy Richler's elegant and moving The Impostor Bride, is a multi-generational story that radiates out of post-War Montreal and contends with memory, absence, and imagination.

What's on your shelves?

Fifty years of service

I believe that diplomas, citations and awards should, like false teeth, be worn with discretion. That's why I've never displayed my plaques and certificates, but I may make an exception for the document I received recently from the Central Conference of American Rabbis that acknowledges the 50th anniversary of my ordination.

I'll cherish it, because I don't see it as a reward for personal achievement, but as a token of humble gratitude to God for having kept me alive and given me the privilege to serve my people for half a century.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

I became a rabbi as a largely unconscious reaction to the arid secular world in which I was reared. But in time, I also realized that a deeper reason for being drawn to the faith of my forebears was the desire to warrant the fact that, unlike most of my Polish-Jewish contemporaries, I survived the Holocaust and, therefore, felt that I had a duty to vindicate my survival by finding meaning in preserving and furthering Judaism. The rabbinate was the most obvious vehicle. I first came to it out of a desire to learn, understand and, above all, act. In the process, I found my faith.

The rabbinic college in London that accepted me was established in the shadow of the Holocaust as a successor to the Reform seminary in Berlin. It was named after Rabbi Leo Baeck, the legendary leader of German Jewry during the Nazi period who had survived Theresienstadt. Most of my teachers had been his students. However, they taught very little about the Holocaust and its implications for contemporary Judaism. Even Rabbi Baeck himself wrote about it only obliquely. It seems that what had happened had been too traumatic to be as yet articulated.

It was first in the late 1960s that the subject came onto the agenda of Jewish thought, largely thanks to Prof. Emil Fackenheim of Toronto. He maintained that the most cogent Jewish response to what Hitler had done was not to give him a posthumous victory. Our challenge must be to make sure that the Jewish people would survive and thrive.

This message further validated my rabbinate. I was now able to put my original attraction to it into a coherent context and recognize that serving God and the Jewish people was to make a much-needed contribution to the sacred struggle for Jewish survival. I also saw my commitment to the State of Israel that I had first visited in 1957, months before coming to rabbinic school, in that context.

My challenge throughout has been to formulate Judaism in ways that combine being anchored in its sources and traditions with an appreciation of the needs of contemporary Jews, not only in order to adapt Jewish observance in that light but also to express the tenets of the faith in modern terms. It's this that made me a Reform rabbi.

In time, I also discovered that I had much in common with progressive Christians, even though most of them were oblivious to the Holocaust. They served liberal denominations and were engaged in the struggle of fusing tradition with modernity. Having discovered how much we had in common, despite our very different backgrounds, made it possible for me to engage first in interfaith work and later in joint efforts of tikkun olam, "mending the world," another Fackenheim theme.

I believe that commitment to faith couched in the language of western liberalism is the most coherent way of keeping our civilization open, sane and vibrant, despite the current backlash of secular cynicism on the one hand and obscurantist fundamentalism on the other.

Contrary to contemporary trends, I'm not into "spirituality" as a way of Jewish renewal. This alternative to tradition seems to be more concerned with "me" than with "us," with psychology than with theology. Too often it falsely identifies personal needs and fads with the will of God. I see it as yet another secular substitute for faith, not an authentic expression of it.

I know that I'm in the minority, but I'm by no means alone. And one of the many rewards of the last half-century of service has been that our Israeli son, born to us shortly before I was ordained, has chosen a similar path, first as a rabbi in Haifa and now as a teacher and mentor of future generations of Reform religious leaders.

Israeli-Turkish trade booming

Israel's bilateral relations with Turkey have been adversely affected by a succession of jolting events since 2009, yet Israel's commercial relationship with Turkey has never been better.

The Israeli invasion of the Gaza Strip drew condemnation from the Islamist Turkish government, as did the Mavi Marmara incident, which resulted in the deaths of nine Turks after Israeli commandos intercepted a Turkish ship in a pro-Palestinian flotilla trying to break Israel's naval siege of Gaza.

This maritime clash prompted Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, to expel Israel's ambassador in Ankara, downgrade the level of diplomatic ties and cancel all military agreements.

Sheldon Kirshner in Turkey

Despite these crushing events, Israel's mercantile ties with Turkey – the sole Muslim member of the NATO alliance –are booming. "On the economic side, we're reached record high levels," said an Israeli diplomat based in Istanbul, Turkey's cosmopolitan hub.

Two-way trade, having surpassed the $4-billion mark in 2011, far exceeds the level of Israel's commercial relations with Canada. By 2013, he noted, the figure is expected to reach $5 billion.

Since the tumultuous Mavi Marmara affair, the volume of trade has increased by a whopping 35 per cent, said Ertan Tezgor, a senior Turkish diplomat who works out of Ankara, Turkey's capital. "Trade will not be affected by political differences," he declared.

Tezgor's colleague, a diplomat who asked to remain anonymous but was once stationed in Jerusalem and now tends to Turkey's relations with Israel and the Palestinians, sounded an identical theme. As he put it, "Trade relations can develop in spite of political problems. Why not?"

In the final analysis, pragmatism trumps politics, says Menashe Carmon, the chair of the Israel Turkey Business Council, an organization with a membership of more than 100 companies.

Israel signed a free trade agreement with Turkey in 2000. It was a historic accord, Israel's first such agreement with a Muslim country. Since then, there has been a remarkably steady progression in trade and investment.

For Israeli entrepreneurs, Turkey, with a population of 75 million, is a key market. Boasting the 15th-largest economy in the world and a $1-trillion GDP, Turkey has a vibrant industrial base. It is particularly strong in construction, electronics, food, machinery, ships, textiles and mining. And its banking and automobile sectors are also thriving.

Stanley Fischer, the governor of the Bank of Israel, does not underestimate the economic importance of Turkey to Israel. Shortly after Turkey expelled Israel's ambassador, he said, "In terms of the sophisticated economies in the region, which is where we export most successfully, Turkey is the most important."

Turkey's chief exports to Israel are vehicles, construction materials, metals, electronic devices, textiles and accessories. Israel's exports to Turkey are high-tech manufacturing machinery and parts, refined petroleum and agricultural products, water irrigation systems, plastics and chemicals.

Last year, Turkey exported roughly $2.3 billion worth of goods to Israel, while the comparable figure for Israel was about $2 billion.

At last count, Turkey was Israel's sixth-most-important trading partner, after such countries as the United States, Germany, China and India.

The automobile sector is especially crucial. In 2011, approximately 10 per cent of Israeli car imports were from Turkey, with U.S. Fords, French Renaults and South Korean Hyundais leading the pack. By all accounts, Israel's $330-million car market was Turkey's biggest outside Europe.

According to Turkey's foreign ministry, 232 Israeli companies, ranging from Israel Chemicals to Netafim Crop, have invested $400 million in Turkey, mostly in real estate, banking, telecommunications and tourism and in joint ventures with Turkish companies.

Reports suggest that Israeli businesses use their Turkish partners to sell to Arab countries, while Turkish companies use their Israeli counterparts to penetrate markets in the United States.

Turkish companies are active in Israel.

Yilmazlar Holding, a construction firm, has completed projects to the tune of $667 million since 1995. Cimsa Holding invested $10 million in a cement filling facility. Guney Yildiz Petrol has been working as a sub-contractor for an American company. Zorlu Holding built a natural gas power plant in partnership with a U.S. company and sold its shares in 2008.

Turkey's political estrangement from Israel, however, has had a negative impact on tourism and defence-related products.

Prior to the Gaza war, 560,000 Israeli tourists flocked to Turkey, only a 90-minute flight from Tel Aviv. But in response to Turkey's sharp condemnation of Israel's invasion of Gaza, Israel's minister of tourism urged Israelis to boycott Turkey. His advice was heeded. During the period from January to August 2011, only 62,000 Israelis, the majority of whom were Israeli Arabs, visited Turkey.

Israelis thereby accounted for 0.05 per cent of Turkey's foreign tourists, compared to three per cent during the heyday of Israel's honeymoon with Turkey. The slack was filled by Arabs, with 1.4 million visiting Turkey in the first half of 2011.

Israel's trade with Turkey is booming despite political differences, but far fewer Israeli tourists are visiting Turkey. This is a view of Istanbul's main street, Istiklal Caddesi.

Turkish Airlines – a member of the Star Alliance, along with Air Canada – still flies to Tel Aviv. But El Al Airlines, Israel's flagship carrier, cancelled its service to Turkey due to security problems.

When Israel's political bonds with Turkey were at their apex, Israel was one of Turkey's most reliable suppliers of weaponry. Whether such sales were included in overall trade figures is uncertain. But when times were good, Israel modernized Turkey's fleet of F-4 Phantoms and F-5 aircraft for $900 million, upgraded Turkish M60 tanks for $687 million and sold Turkey Popeye missiles.

But after September 2011, Turkey froze more than a dozen defence contracts with Israel valued in the billions of dollars. Late last year, as part of a reassessment of its strategic relations with Turkey, Israel cancelled a $141-million contract to supply Turkey with an aerial intelligence system.

Israel's former ambassador to Turkey, Alon Liel, claims that Turkey began cutting back on big arms deals with Israel as early as 2003, when Erdogan took office. But in virtually all other respects, Israel's economic relations with Turkey are on an upward trajectory.

Steinbergs give $12M to North York General

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Montreal natives Charlotte, 79, and Lewis Steinberg, 81, have donated what is believed to be the largest gift by individual donors to a community hospital in Canadian history.

The Steinbergs, who have lived in Toronto since 1978, have contributed $12 million to North York General Hospital's $150-million fundraising initiative, which will support facility upgrades, new technologies and equipment, research and education, as well as emerging priorities.

The Steinbergs' gift will go toward the redevelopment of the Charlotte & Lewis Steinberg Emergency unit, the establishment of the Steinberg Family Acute Care Unit, and the purchase of a new CT scanner.

An earlier donation to the same campaign went toward purchasing three digital mammography machines for the BMO Financial Group Breast Diagnostic Centre, establishing the Karen, Heather & Lynn Steinberg Breast Services facility, in honour of the couple's three daughters. They also have six grandchildren.

The south tower of the hospital, facing Highway 401, will also be renamed the Steinberg Family Tower.

The Steinbergs' previous gifts to the hospital include the renovation and naming of the Charlotte & Lewis Steinberg Emergency unit in 2001, the Charlotte & Lewis Steinberg Familial Breast and Ovarian Cancer Clinic in 1998, critical equipment for the ear, nose and throat department in 2003, sentinel lymph node biopsy equipment for the detection of breast cancer in 1999, and electromyogram equipment used to diagnose neurological problems in 2001.

North York General is one of the country's busiest community hospitals. In 2010/2011, it treated 28,830 patients and 218,701 outpatients, and the emergency department received 113,583 visits.

The hospital serves one of Canada's most diverse communities and socio-economic areas, and has the country's highest population of elderly patients.

Harold Heft, the hospital's executive vice-president of philanthropy and communications, said that among patients declaring their religion, 15 to 20 per cent said they were Jewish.

Lewis Steinberg – whose grandmother, Ida, started the Steinberg supermarket chain with one grocery store in Montreal in 1917 and saw her sons expand it into Quebec's largest, with a strong presence in Ontario as well – said that his family has been connected to North York General since they moved here and Charlotte needed surgery.

"We were happy with the care she received. Staff was compassionate and understanding, and they answered all our questions. We could see that the other patients felt the same way. I told [Charlotte], 'We should support the hospital.'"

They went to the hospital foundation, and decided that they would donate funds to help underwrite the program to test for BRCA1 and BRCA2 genes, which are associated with breast cancer.

"Cancer is a family disease, because it affects the whole family. The program needed [help with the cost of] psychologists and social workers," which is where they directed their gift, Lewis said.

Whenever the couple makes a donation, he said, they like to see results. "It makes us feel good to meet the doctors and staff in programs [we're funding]."

Charlotte, formerly an X-ray technician at the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal, said that North York General is a "real community hospital, and we want to ensure its highest standards."

The Steinbergs, who belong to Beth Sholom Synagogue, also donated $1 million to Baycrest to help support the centre's recently opened Charlotte and Lewis Steinberg Slow Stream Rehabilitation Centre.

Charlotte said her parents, Ernie and Fannie Schneiderman, from Brockville, Ont., and in-laws, Anne and Nathan Steinberg, all believed in giving to the community.

"As soon as we moved here, we got involved, and we hope that other people in the community will follow our example."

Fashion show raises $50,000 for seniors

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

Young Jewish professionals modelled new designs at a recent charity fashion show that raised nearly $50,000 for seniors programs.

This is the most Bac2Fashion, which is now in its fourth year, has raised so far.

"It's a really unique way to bring together the young adult community for a cause we can all relate to," said event co-chair Jessica Taylor.

The Bac2Fashion event, held on June 7 in the Great Hall on trendy Queen Street West in Toronto, was hosted by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Community Connect (CoCo), a network of 20- and 30-year-old Jewish professionals.

"Lots of people tell us that when they finish university, they miss that connection they had to their community – lots of us were involved with Hillel – and suddenly you don't have that anymore," said event co-chair Raquel Binder. "We're missing that peer group, and this network helps create a sense of self and continue that connection."

In keeping with the goal of raising funds and awareness about seniors challenges in Toronto, the event opened with models walking down the runway with seniors themselves. "This was definitely a highlight of the show. One senior told me she felt like she was queen for the day," said Taylor.

The packed two-storey venue was filled with young professionals and those they were supporting – seniors in Toronto. The runway show, which featured models wearing new fashions from more than eight Toronto boutiques, was intermixed with dance performances. The event was a "fun, creative way to support the community," said Taylor.

With the theme "Making It," the event was also designed to celebrate the career accomplishments of Jewish professionals – in the fashion industry and beyond.

The funds raised will help establish a Healthy @ Home website, to bring social, recreational, educational and cultural resources to seniors homes. The site will give isolated seniors a chance to be involved in their communities, too.

I really like that it is a multi-generational affair; it's good for seniors to know that the young are helping them

"I really like that it is a multi-generational affair," said Joy Cherry, who attended the event. "It is creating awareness of older ones who need the support – and it's good for seniors to know that the young are helping them."

But it's not just the seniors who benefit. "It's a great way for young professionals who are finding their way in life to keep them grounded in the Jewish community," said Taylor. "We have truly made it."

Moroccan king's adviser promotes Arab-Jewish amity

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Andre Azoulay is a bridge builder par excellence.

For years now, he has devoted himself to building coexistence and understanding between the Arab world and Diaspora Jewish communities and fostering dialogue between Islam and western societies.

"It is my mission in life," he said in an interview last week.

Azoulay, a Moroccan Jew, is a senior adviser to King Mohammed VI of Morocco, a pro-western North African Muslim country that has worked for Arab-Israeli reconciliation and peace.

Azoulay was here as a guest of the newly formed Communaute Juive Marocaine de Toronto, an organization that promotes Moroccan Jewish culture and history. Headed by Simon Keslassy, the CJMT was the sponsor of "2,000 Years of Jewish Life in Morocco," a recent eight-day celebration of the Jewish experience there.

The event, mainly sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Sephardic Federation and the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, coincided with the 50th anniversary of Canada-Morocco diplomatic relations.

Azoulay, who was born in the Moroccan town of Essaouira-Mogador in 1941, studied economics, journalism and international relations in Paris. From 1968 to 1990, he was employed by the Paribas Bank in Paris in an executive position.

With his death in 1999, his successor, Mohammed VI – who has called the Holocaust "one of the most tragic chapters of modern history" –reappointed Azoulay, who advises the royal court on economic affairs and plays a role in encouraging foreign investment in Morocco.

By his own reckoning, he is the king's sole Jewish adviser, and the only Jew in the Arab world who fulfils such a function.

Azoulay is president of the executive committee of the Foundation of Three Cultures and Three Religions, based in Seville, and one of the founders of the Aladdin Project, with headquarters in Paris.

He is also president of the Anna Lindh Euro-Mediterranean Foundation and a member of the Alliance of Civilizations, a United Nations body created at the suggestion of Spain and Turkey.

Asked what these organizations have achieved, Azoulay would only say that time will tell. As he put it, "It's a long process, not an easy one, a long way. It needs time, commitment and loyalty."

Andre Azoulay

He rejected the idea that the Islamic world and the West are on a collision course in a clash of civilizations.

"It's a theory we have to resist," he said in French-accented English, noting that religion and politics should not be conflated.

There is, however, a "clash of ignorance." He said, "We know a lot about western civilization in the Arab world. But what do westerners know about my [Arab] traditions? We have to fill this gap with education."

In a reference to the Arab world's golden era centuries ago, he observed, "My region was exporting mathematics and poetry when westerners were breaking stones."

Decrying the stigmatization of Islam, Azoulay said that Islamophobia and antisemitism are cut from the same cloth of racism. "To resist antisemitism, you have to fight Islamophobia."

When asked what accounts for Islamophobia, he replied, "I don't know. We need pages and books to explain this phenomenon. Globally, we've regressed. This issue didn't exist 30 or 40 years ago."

He claimed that the events of 9/11 were not a factor in sparking or exacerbating Islamophobia.

Turning to the Arab-Israeli conflict, Azoulay said a two-state solution is necessary to defuse Israel's dispute with the Palestinians. "We've missed many opportunities for peace. Justice, dignity and freedom should be the basis of a solution."

Claiming that peace is possible, despite setbacks in the diplomatic process, Azoulay said, "It's vital to have a Palestinian state, for the region and the whole world community."

Morocco has "done all it can" to promote peace, he said in an allusion to the late King Hassan II's behind-the-scenes role in fostering a rapprochement between Israel and Egypt in the late 1970s.

Azoulay, a resident of Rabat who described himself as "a Berber, Arab and Jew" in terms of identity, claimed that close to one million Jews of Moroccan ancestry, primarily in Israel, France and Canada, consider Morocco their "mother country" with respect to history, culture and cuisine.

"They are Moroccan ambassadors," he said. "Moroccan Judaism is a happy story."

In his estimation, Morocco, populated by about 260,000 Jews in 1948, is home to 3,000 to 5,000 Jews today. Asked whether there will be a Jewish community in Morocco in another generation, he said, "I hope so."

Morocco has weathered the Arab Spring of national rebellions thanks to its status as a constitutional monarchy with a multi-party political system and a free market economy, he said.

"Morocco didn't wait for any Arab Spring. We've made deep structural reforms. I don't remember one year when we didn't change something. We're engaged in a culture of change. That's why we're different than other Arab countries."

Media misses simmering Turkish-Iranian tension

Last week's column dealt with the growing authoritarianism of Turkish Prime Minister Recep Erdogan's pro-Islamist Freedom and Justice Party (AKP), despite his claim that Turkey is a beacon of secular democracy for the Arab Spring to emulate.

This week's column looks at the broader role that Turkey is seeking as an influencer in the Arab and Muslim worlds vis-a-vis Iran.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

While western media have given limited attention to the erosion of liberal democracy within Turkey, they have focused even less on the regional confrontation between Turkey and Iran. To be sure, journalists and pundits have discussed Turkey with respect to the Syrian crisis and Iran with respect to both its role in Syria and its illegal nuclear program. Yet what has not received the attention it deserves is the ongoing struggle between Turkey and Iran for regional dominance – and its far-reaching implications.

With dramatic growth in bilateral trade between the two countries since Erdogan became prime minister in 2003 – trade has increased from $1 billion in 2000 to $10 billion in 2010, and leaped to $15 billion in 2011 – relations on the surface seem to be very healthy. In fact, Turkey has been widely viewed by the West to be one of the leading weak links in the international economic sanctions against Tehran.

When Turkish Development Minister Cevdet Yilmaz met late last month in Tehran with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Iran's state-controlled Press TV reported that Ahmadinejad praised the "expanding and deepening" ties between the two countries and claimed to share "common enemies" who want to thwart these relations.

According to Reuters, in 2011 Turkey was Iran's fifth-largest oil customer, buying around 200,000 barrels per day (amounting to 30 per cent of its total imports and more than seven per cent of Iran's oil exports).

However, in May, under U.S. pressure to isolate Iran over its nuclear policy, Ankara cut its imports from Iran to 140,000 barrels per day, a 20 per cent reduction. Along with India, South Korea and four other countries purchasing Iranian crude, Turkey has just been granted a 180-day U.S. exemption from financial sanctions. The hope is that, in six months, Turkey will undertake further cuts while it finds replacement sources elsewhere – primarily Saudi Arabia, Libya and Venezuela.

Besides American pressure, what has seriously frayed relations between Turkey and Iran has been Tehran's financial, military and strategic support for Syrian President Bashar Assad, whose brutal assault on his own people continues with no end in sight. In the meantime, Turkey has provided refuge to thousands of Syrian refugees and a safe haven to the Syrian opposition.

Not surprisingly, just this month, Iran's Gen. Yahya Safavi, a former Revolutionary Guard commander and current military aide to Supreme Leader Ayatollah Khamenei, accused Turkey, Saudi Arabia and Qatar of serving American and Israeli interests. Safavi charged: "The Americans, Israelis, and some European and Persian Gulf nations, in particular Qatar and Saudi Arabia, have delegated to Turkey the task of achieving their goal to weaken or topple Bashar Assad's government or make it surrender… Qatar, Saudi Arabia and Turkey are acting in the interests of the U.S. and the Zionists to weaken the resistance axis comprising Iran, Syria and Hezbollah."

In recent analysis pieces for PBS Frontline, Alex Vatanka explained this growing tension: "The idea that Turkey is seeking regional dominance at the expense of Iran permeates almost all Iranian analysis about Istanbul's policies in the Middle East, not just Syria. Tehran sees a direct Turkish challenge to its interests in places such as Iraq… Lately, the Iran-Turkey split has also begun to resemble the kind of sectarian competition that has long characterized Iranian-Saudi relations."

"The rivalry reflects Iran's innate fear of Turkey gaining geopolitical advantages due to Tehran's isolation, which is a product of its nuclear standoff with the West and the limitations of its political appeal to Arab regimes and peoples."

A third regional power (not addressed above) is Saudi Arabia, which has managed, largely through its financial clout, to thwart the regional ambitions of both Turkey and Iran. That, however, is a subject for another time.

Leo Baeck adopts more Israel-centric curriculum

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Leo Baeck Day School is prompting its students and staff to become more educated about contemporary Israel in an ongoing effort to have them engage more personally with the Jewish state.

Head of school Eric Petersiel told The CJN that a re-tooling of Leo Baeck's program of "Israel engagement" has been in progress for nearly two years.

"We recognized a while ago that one of the reasons people choose our school is a commitment to the State of Israel. And we wanted to make sure it was being presented in a meaningful, realistic modern manner," he said.

Petersiel said the move to make become more focused on modern-day Israel involved a methodical process.

He said staff had been assigned to study the school's existing policies and practices relating to Israel, then presented their findings to their colleagues over the course of two PD days, one last June and another this past November.

Leo Baeck aims to present Israel from a modern, progressive point of view, warts and all, Petersiel said. This is being done in order to allow students to wrestle with complex issues about Israeli society and politics so they are better prepared to defend the country when they leave the Jewish school system.

It's a skill that has been lacking, he said, noting that for years, Jewish day school graduates have felt unprepared to tackle issues such as "Israeli Apartheid Week" or the boycott and divestment movement once they get to university.

To that end, the new plan to teach about contemporary Israeli culture demands that school staff be able to speak openly about their own preconceived notions and understanding of Israel.

"Our responsibility is to teach students how to evaluate a variety of opinions and then make their own. So we thought it was important for staff to investigate their own biases first so they can have that conversation with students," Petersiel said.

Eric Petersiel

Like their counterparts at many Jewish day schools, Leo Baeck's staff and students have adopted the "hugging and wrestling" model of relating to Israel.

The term, used as part of the overall teaching philosophy on understanding modern Israel, refers to loving Israel as a Zionist while at the same time being unafraid to be critical when warranted.

"In some cases, Israel is a blind spot for Zionist institutions," he said. "[Often] people are simply taught 'You're going to love Israel' and that's not a realistic way to understand it.

"We have a responsibility to give kids critical skills and say to them 'Here are all the different ways certain people look at tough issues like Israel, and you have to know that your job as a modern Jew in the modern world is to winnow those opinions down and come up with your own meaningful understanding of the complex issues," he said.

Petersiel noted said it's almost impossible for a 12- or 13-year-old to adopt an "adult-level" opinion of Israel all at once.

"It takes a lifetime to sort through. It takes a lifetime to develop those skills. But we're very comfortable now in giving our students a deeper understanding and the skills with which to make those decisions."

Supplementing the school's teachings on Israel are also live examples of contemporary Israeli society: young emissaries from the Holy Land who interact directly with students and staff.

The project was started nearly four years ago to help local Jewish young people get a sense of what their peers in Israel feel, think and do.

As the flagship program of federation's nascent Israel engagement committee, it brings pre-army Israelis to Toronto "to provide a living bridge between Israel and Toronto," according to the committee.

It's also partly funded by the Jewish Agency for Israel.

The program has grown since 2007 from two shinshinim to more than 20 emissaries who participate in numerous schools and affiliated synagogues, as well as summer camps in and around Toronto and North America.

They can also be found at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Robbins Hebrew Academy, Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School and Associated Hebrew Schools, among others.

Emissaries are billeted at host family homes during their stays in Toronto.

This year, Leo Baeck hosted four shinshinim – two on each of its campuses – and their presence, Petersiel said, is "invaluable for our students to understand that Israel is a real, meaningful place. There are issues of enlisting in the army and what that means for these kids. It's a very impactful experience for all these kids."

The Leo Baeck shinshinim this year were Or Shalem, Mai Levi, Michal Cohen, and Ariel Levy. In a joint letter to The CJN, they expressed their gratitude for their time in Toronto and noted how important they felt it was to impact students in the Diaspora.

"We come with the goal of bringing the real Israel, the Israel of today, to the students at our schools, congregants in our synagogues, and young people at our youth movements and summer camps. We came here expecting to give, but we are amazed at how much we have received and grown as well," they wrote.

"We live with families from our school and synagogue, and it's been so wonderful to live with such committed, hospitable, and proudly Reform and Zionist families. Our host families become our families, staying up late to chat, giving us support and advice, cooking shakshuka, and listening to Israeli radio or Hebrew music with us. Being embraced by such warm and welcoming families and building relationships with new moms, dads, sisters, brothers, bubbies, and zaides, is one of the most meaningful parts of our year here."

One of the ways Leo Baeck and the Young Emissary Program ensure that students understand the realities of Israel is by re-introducing the previous year's shinshinim to students by way of live video chat from their Israel Defence Forces barracks dressed in their military uniforms.

"Our kids say, 'This is the person that hung around and joked and laughed with me last year and taught me about Israel, and now they're there offering their lives to support the State of Israel.' It's a very powerful experience," Petersiel said.

While the program has had an impact on students, Petersiel said he wasn't sure how long Leo Baeck can afford to keep it running, as it's increasingly expensive to maintain.

"It's a huge investment by our school. We're committed to it and believe it's incredibly valuable, but it's hard" to finance, he said. "What I hope is that community donors realize the significance of it and find a way to fund what may be the most meaningful, realistic connection for our students to ensure Israel is a real part of their lives."

Petersiel said even though the cost of the program is shared between the school and federation, Leo Baeck's costs for it have risen continuously since its inception.

Kiever Shul marks its centennial

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

The Kiever Shul was the place where Pinya Balsky, an immigrant from Ukraine, found community.

The Kiever Shul, located at the corner of Bellevue Avenue and Denison Square, is one of Kensington Market's best-known historical landmarks. [Barbara Silverstein photo]

"He was drawn to the shul, because he was lonely," recalls his daughter, Polly Soloway, 96. "He went to the shul for the companionship of the other men.

"I remember when the shul was being built. He stood outside and watched the workers lay each brick. That was his recreation."

That domed red brick building at the corner of Bellevue Avenue and Denison Square, a designated heritage site, has been a landmark in Kensington Market for 85 years. But the Kiever congregation, the Russian Congregation of Rodfei Sholem Anshei Kiev, has actually been in existence for 100 years.

On June 24, the shul marks its centennial with a special Sunday service. It's one of several events in the works for the shul's 100th anniversary. Plans are also being finalized to honour Cantor Pinchus Gutter – he's been leading services there for 25 years – and longtime president, David Pinkus, who's been at the helm of the synagogue since 1979.

In fact, Pinkus was recently named a Jewish Community Hero by the Jewish Federations of North America for his dedication and years of service to the Kiever.

He says the shul was more than a place of worship: it was also a communal centre where landsmen from the Kiev area formed friendships and helped one another.

Since many of the male congregants made their living selling food, business relationships were forged there as well, Pinkus explains.

While his parents, Izzie and Mollie Pinkus, were founding members and Izzie helped out financially, they were not "involved in shul politics," he says.

But Alexander Gershman, father of Bess Friedman, was very active in the leadership. Bess Friedman remembers his friendly rivalry with Pinya Balsky: every year, the two men vied for the presidency of the shul.

"His [Balsky's] wife was my mother's best friend," says Friedman, 83. "We'd have family picnics together. The women would be chatting away, and the men wouldn't talk to each other." But all was forgiven by Yom Kippur.

Of course, no shul president has served longer than Pinkus. He says he was asked to take on the presidency to defuse some conflicts on the board and because he lived near the shul. He had actually been on the board intermittently for about 15 years before becoming president 33 years ago.

Many people credit him with keeping the Kiever operating these last three decades. He says he took on this responsibility because he felt it was important to preserve the shul so younger generations could appreciate the Toronto Jewish community's roots in Kensington Market.

After the majority of congregants moved north along the Bathurst Street corridor in the 1950s, the Kiever's maintenance was neglected and it fell into serious disrepair by the mid-'70s.

Pinkus says he was part of a group spearheaded by the late historian Stephen Speisman, "with the foresight to preserve the synagogue. Shuls were being destroyed all over the place. They said it was time to save the shul.

"They picked the Kiever because they thought they could get a government grant for a historical site."

In this first phase of renovation, the windows were repaired, doors were replaced, the basement was gutted and the bathroom and kitchen were renovated.

In reality, the physical maintenance of the building and its modernization has been a work-in-progress since 1981.

A modest and discreet person, Pinkus has quietly raised funds and overseen the extensive renovation of the shul.

The plumbing, heating, and electric wiring have all been updated. The floors and benches were refinished, the bathrooms and kitchen have been renovated twice, air conditioning has been installed, the yard has been landscaped, and wrought-iron window covering with the Star of David and a matching fence now adorn the property.

When prodded, Pinkus acknowledges that his training as a mechanical engineer and his decades of service on local hospital and community agency boards equipped him to manage the renovations and raise money for the various projects.

When he took over the presidency back in 1979, Pinkus reorganized the finances with assistance from his brother Max, 99, the shul's treasurer for many years.

"The synagogue operated like a business on Spadina," Pinkus recounts. "It didn't have money to operate for a full year, so it borrowed money from the bank until September when it could sell High Holiday tickets to defray the bank loan."

He says he built up a membership and collected dues so he "wouldn't have to go running to the bank."

Along with managing the finances and renovations, Pinkus has been looking after the membership, cemeteries, bar mitzvahs and other life-cycle events, as well as all the ongoing physical upkeep of the building.

He says it has also been his responsibility to maintain the continuity of the traditional service. "The mandate of the shul was Orthodox. I think I have carried that out."

SCOT aimed at uniting Sephardi community

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When Jacob Abecassis founded the Sephardic Community of Toronto (SCOT), he envisioned an organization that would appeal to Jews of all denominations, affiliated or not.

Abecassis said that SCOT, a non-profit organization that provides recreational, educational and cultural programming, fills a need for events that appeal to Jews who may not identify with synagogue culture.

"We were lacking these types of events in our communities," he said.

"Those who could identify with the synagogue would come to synagogue programming on a religious level, but those who couldn't… were left by the wayside."

Abecassis, a 44-year-old father of eight kids between the ages of 19 and two, said making sure the next generation has programs that help them connect to their community is important to him.

Although the organization was registered about three years ago, the seeds for SCOT were planted in 2006, when families were invited to meet at the Future Stars Arena for a weekly ice skating program called Saturday Night Chill.

"The kids would look forward to it every motza'ei Shabbat, to come out for some skating fun with their parents. It was an activity to get our kids off the streets," Abecassis said. "We've been occupying the rink every Saturday night from September into March."

He stressed that Jews of all backgrounds are welcome to the events, as the programming has less to do with promoting Sephardi culture and more to do with bringing people together.

"It's not solely Sephardic, we're open to everybody. With the family skating, we have the Russian community coming out, the Ashkenazi community. The kids have friends from school that they love hanging out with," he said.

"Why would you segregate people, God forbid? There are people from all levels of observance and you appeal to everybody. We're seeing people who never affiliated themselves with a synagogue who are coming out to these events. The synagogue didn't do it for them, but now we're starting to see faces, and we think, 'Where were they? Where did they come from?'"

Jacob Abecassis

Today, SCOT activities include Lag b'Omer barbeques, Toronto Marlies hockey games, fundraisers for Jewish charities, a soccer league and a summer camp.

Abecassis said he's working on obtaining charitable status from the government, but until now, he's relied on manpower from volunteers and funding from business owners and private donors to keep the programs running.

Some of SCOT's funders include Michael Serruya of Yogen Früz, Leon Elmaleh of Dorplex Industries, and Jack and Joseph Bitton of Eurofase Lighting.

SCOT continues to expand and attract young families looking for quality Jewish programming, Abecassis said. There are nearly 1,000 people on his e-mail list.

"The last barbeque we had after Lag b'Omer, which was called Meat and Greet, at Earl Bales Park, attracted about 300 people," he said.

For the third consecutive summer, SCOT will be recruiting young soccer players for its Sephardic Soccer League.

"Last year, we had 90 kids sign up, and this year, we're expecting 150 kids," he said.

The teams meet each Wednesday night in July and August at Lakehurst Park in Vaughan.

This summer, SCOT will open a summer camp for the first time.

"Right now, we're at 65 kids and 24 [counsellors in training]… This is the first year we're doing it on our own and we've got an excellent program. It's really coming together and we're raising money to get the budget covered," he said, explaining that the camp fees are subsidized.

He's also planning a leadership-training program to educate the next generation of community leaders.

"The more we can invest in our kids to become leaders – in case the Canada Pension Plan is not around for me when I retire, at least I'll have these kids to do some programming for me," he said with a laugh.

Abecassis said some of the programs also focus on giving back, by partnering with other established Jewish charities, including Ezrat Achim, which provides weekly food and financial assistance to needy Jewish families, and Peace of Mind, a program that benefits former Israeli soldiers suffering from psychological trauma.

"The community has responded well to the organization. They see what SCOT is doing for the community and see that it's done with the intent of bringing our community together," he said.

While Abecassis laid the foundation for what is growing into a recognized Jewish cultural organization, he emphasized that SCOT is an initiative that's owned and operated by the entire community.

"SCOT is the community coming together, and it's the community that makes the difference. And it's the people who want to work for the community who make it happen," he said. "I'm very thankful to those who are supporting it financially. People are starting to buy the product and believe in the product."

The United Church should not boycott Israel

This August, delegates will meet at the General Council of the United Church of Canada where they will decide on a new policy toward the Middle East, including a proposed boycott of Israeli settlements. If the policy is ratified in its current form, the United Church will exit the ranks of the genuine peace movement and enter the same camp as those anti-Israel activists who aim to isolate and undermine the legitimacy of Jewish state.

Shimon Fogel

The proposed boycott is based on a recent report by a United Church working group that, despite containing some positive aspects, is largely marked by historical distortions. In the report's initial version, perhaps the most obscene is a direct comparison between the Holocaust and the challenges faced by Palestinians. Shockingly, the report stated that both were characterized by the denial or loss of dignity ("the deepest meaning of the Holocaust.") It further describes Israel's presence in the West Bank as "the primary contributor to the injustice that underlies the violence of the region" – a baffling statement given the atrocities inflicted by the likes of Syria, Iran, Hamas, and Hezbollah. Unfortunately, the words "Hamas" and "Hezbollah" appear not once in the United Church's 26-page report.

The report concludes by putting virtually all of the onus on Israel to resolve the conflict, calling for a church-wide boycott of Israeli products from settlement communities in order to pressure the Jewish state. Regardless of one's opinion on the long-term status of the settlements (and Jewish opinion – both Canadian and Israeli – is quite diverse on this topic), to propose a boycott of settlements is to ignore a basic fact of history. For it is indisputable that when Israel has had a reliable partner for peace on the other side of the table, Israelis have made serious compromises on the settlements.

Guest Voice

In fact, Israel withdrew thousands of settlers from the Sinai after signing a peace agreement with Egypt, and peace has lasted for some three decades. However, when Israel removed every last settlement from Gaza in 2005 as a unilateral concession, the response was the firing of 10,000 missiles and mortars from Gaza into Israel. The lesson is clear. A future for both sides can only be secured through a negotiated peace accord that ends the conflict once and for all (and addresses various issues, including settlements). In other words, violent Arab rejection of Israel since 1947 is the core issue, of which the post-1967 settlements are one of numerous resulting products.

As Jewish Canadians, regardless of our healthy diversity of opinion on Israeli policy decisions, we cannot be silent bystanders as the United Church aims to target Israelis for boycott. Now is the time for solidarity with our fellow Jews and principled action as a community.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, and Jewish communities across Canada, are reaching out to our neighbours in the United Church. This critical work depends on grassroots Jewish activists. It depends on you.

There are two simple steps you can take to make a difference today. First, get the facts on the United Church's proposed policy at www.cija.ca/issues/ucc. Second, call, e-mail, or arrange a meeting with your local United Church clergy. Go to locator.united-church.ca to find a local congregation. Make the case for the church to promote peace and reconciliation – not boycotts.

Jews and the Olympics, Pt. 2

Thousands of athletes will soon arrive in London, England, to compete in the 30th Summer Olympics. Although Jewish athletes have shared in Olympic glory, for Jews, the memory of the Olympics also includes racism, violence and death. Today, a look at that history.

The Jews in Sports website has created biographies for 722 Jewish athletes who have competed in the modern games. Everybody from Israel's Ruth Abeles (gymnastics, Squaw Valley 1960) to U.S.-Israeli dual citizen Rami Zur (kayaking, Sydney 2000, Athens 2004). [http://bit.ly/jolymp11]

One of the stars of the first modern games was Alfred Flatow of Germany who brought home three golds and a silver in gymnastics in 1896. Those four medals tied Flatow with the second most in Athens. The International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame lists the medal count for every Jewish Olympian from Athens 1896 to Vancouver 2010. [http://bit.ly/jolymp12]

Two of the best-known Jewish Olympians competed a half-century apart. Britain's Harold Abrahams won gold in the 100-metre final at the 1924 Paris Olympics. Abrahams' story is well-known thanks to the 1981 film Chariots of Fire. [http://bit.ly/jolymp13]

The United States' Mark Spitz was the first athlete to win seven gold medals in a single Olympic Games. [http://bit.ly/jolymp14] You can watch a short documentary about Spitz's Munich gold at the Olympics. [http://bit.ly/jolymp15]

Unfortunately, for Jews the memory of the Olympics is not always pleasant. One of the greatest blots on the history of the Games is the Nazi Germany's hosting of the 1936 Summer Olympics. The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum has a comprehensive site detailing those Games, starting in 1931 with the International Olympic Committee's awarding of the 11th Olympiad to Berlin. Although Hitler was elated

Jewish & Digital

with the Games and Germany's athletes captured the most medals overall, the site points out that 13 Jewish athletes and 10 African-American competitors (including Jesse Owens) were medallists at the Games. [http://bit.ly/jolymp16]

And of course, there was the tragedy of the 1972 Munich Olympics when Palestinian terrorists murdered 11 members of the Israeli Olympic delegation. To learn more about it, I recommend the Sports Illustrated section that marks the 30th anniversary of the killings [http://bit.ly/jolymp19], as well as a fascinating Wikipedia entry about the massacre. [http://bit.ly/jolymp20]

This summer, marks the 40th anniversary of the murders, and Israel has asked that the massacre be observed by an official moment of silence. The International Olympic Committee rejected the request by IOC President Jacques Rogge, who said he would attend the Israeli delegation's tribute to those slain in the massacre. "Within the Olympic family, the memory of the victims of the terrible massacre in Munich in 1972 will never fade away." [http://bit.ly/jolymp26]

Israel first sent a delegation to the Helsinki Olympics in 1952, but it wasn't until Barcelona in 1992 when Yael Arad and Oren Samdja took home the country's first medals – both for judo. [http://bit.ly/jolymp21]

Israel's medal count now stands at seven – one silver, five bronze – with sailor Gal Fridman winning the country's first gold in 2004. Nothing beats the pride on Fridman's face as the first notes of Hatikvah were played in Athens. [http://bit.ly/jolymp22]

Time magazine's Jeff Chu called the gold-medal win – three decades after the Munich murders – "Israel's Olympic healing." [http://bit.ly/jolymp23]

Free will challenges us all

God alone is perfect – He and His handiwork. The world truly is full of His Glory. If there is confusion about this – whether it be the beauty or ugliness we see in the world – it stems from His giving us free will, which permits us to see and to do as we wish with all that He has given us.

When I moved to Vancouver almost 13 years ago, the city seemed perfect. Surrounded by breathtaking scenery, the mountains and the ocean seemed like paradise. At the time, I didn't realize that it rains a lot, and winters in Vancouver can be grey and very wet indeed. I was beginning to think how morose my new home was when a congregant of mine told me, in all seriousness, that he really loves the rain!

Our perception of the world is crucial, but even more important is what we choose to do with that perception based on our talents.

I have met people who lived through unspeakable atrocities in their lives, losing their families and loved ones during the Holocaust, but their approach to life is surprisingly positive. For many, their faith in God keeps them going. When Rabbi Israel Meir Lau visited Vancouver, he told us that the Holocaust strengthened his belief in God. He realized that, if he were to abandon his faith, he would capitulate to the Nazis. I found this approach inspiring.

Another who taught me a similar lesson was a con-

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

gregant of mine from the island of Rhodes, who lost many members of his family during the Holocaust, yet he was a true believer in God, an exemplar of happiness and a teacher by his mere presence.

On the other hand, there are many who are quite understandably consumed by the dark horror they lived in those terrible years. Clearly, each remains the author of his or her own fate.

As we are getting close to the three weeks between the 17th of Tammuz and Tisha b'Av, a period commemorating the most tragic moments in Jewish history, it's interesting to note that Pesach and Tisha b'Av begin on the same day of the week. They are profoundly linked, Pesach being the holiday of redemption and freedom and Tisha b'Av, recalling our exile and slavery. Even – or especially – in the depths of our sorrow, we should not lose hope.

A reader of mine wrote in response to my column of Oct. 6, 2011, that while God may have provided us with love and hope during the Holocaust, He didn't provide us with protection. I certainly understand her point. However, what we must seek to understand is that God's promise is to Klal Yisrael (the Jewish People) as a whole and not necessarily to the individual person whose fate we may or may not understand. God may hide His face at times, but He will not abandon our People (Leviticus 26, 43).

May we all endeavour to understand that free will challenges us to make the right choices, sometimes in spite of seemingly insurmountable odds.

Silvan Shalom, the deputy prime minister of Israel, spoke at Chabad's ninth annual Spirit of Community Dinner, which raised funds for the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre in Thornhill, Ont.

At the event held on June 6 at the Terrace Banquet Centre in Vaughan, Ont., Shalom said that the Chabad movement narrows "the gap between religious and secular Jewish in Israel and in the Diaspora."

Turning to the subject of the recent political changes in the Arab world, he said, "The Arab Spring is closer to an Islamic winter."

He encouraged Jews all over the world to support Israel. "When Israel is secured, Jews all over the world are secured," he said.

Shalom also brought a message of thanks and appreciation to Prime Minister Stephen Harper and to Canada. More then 1,100 guests from diverse backgrounds attended the event, among them officials from all levels of government.

Three people were honoured at the dinner, including Canada's Foreign Minister John Baird. Baird, in his absence, was awarded Chabad's International Community Service Award in recognition of his service to Canada. Baird said in a video that Canada and the State of Israel have a special relationship.

Carlo Baldassarra, president and CEO of Greenpark Group of Companies, was awarded the Community Spirit Award, in recognition of his philanthropy and support of the community. His family, including his wife, his kids and his grandchildren, went on stage with him to receive the award and gave him many hugs.

Silvan Shalom

Mordechai Ronen, a Holocaust survivor and 18-year Israel Defence Forces veteran, received the Community Heritage Award in recognition of his community service and activities in remembrance of the victims of the Holocaust, as well as his support of Israel. Ronen made a touching speech, and his 12-year-old granddaughter read a greeting for her grandpa's 80th birthday.

Rabbi Yisroel Landa, the spiritual leader of the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre, spoke about how the honorees demonstrate their concern for the welfare of others by actively supporting newcomers to Canada and "help them to integrate into the society."

He praised Baird and thanked him. "The minister means a lot to us. He is the one that publicly stated that there is no better friend to Israel than Canada," Rabbi Landa said.

The evening ended with a live auction with high bidders winning such items as the opportunity to name a street in Markham, Ont., a dinner for 12 with Markham Mayor Frank Scarpitti, luxury vacations and hockey jerseys from the greatest players in the National Hockey League.

Proceeds from the dinner go toward programs and services for the Israeli immigrant population in the Toronto area, including classes, social services, emergency aid, job networking, counselling, educational programs, lectures, women's group activities, religious services and cultural events. These programs help Israeli immigrants to adapt to their new lives in Canada.

Ushering in the experience economy

Business strategists B. Joseph Pine II and James H. Gilmore contend that economic history has moved through four phases, traceable through the evolution of the birthday cake.

First, agrarian society was a commodity market. One procured flour, sugar, butter and eggs to bake a cake.

Next, in a goods-based economy, mothers bought Betty Crocker or Duncan Hines mix, which they baked and decorated themselves. Manufacturers competed based on the quality of the product they produced.

Class Act

Daniel Held

As manufacturing was standardized and products were differentiated only on the basis of cost, the service economy took root. Companies prided themselves on their ability to cater to the needs of clientele and differentiated themselves through customer service. Families bought pre-baked, iced and packaged cakes, which could be customized with superhero or Disney character icing.

Finally, time-starved families of the 21st century moved us into the experience economy, the latest progression in the economic model. In the experience economy, parents outsource birthday parties to Chuck E. Cheese, Mad Science or other venues.

The experience economy is exemplified by companies such as Disney and the Rainforest Café, as well as by experiences such as sitting in a Parisian café or praying at the Kotel. Moving beyond service, the offerings aren't simply customized, but personalized, existing in the mind of an individual engaged through the full range of senses as well as on an emotional level. Experiences ignite lasting memories. In the words of Pines and Gilmore, while services are delivered to clients, experiences are staged for guests.

There are a few offerings of the experience economy in the Jewish community. In my last column, I wrote about Shavuot retreats, combining nature, Jewish learning and recreation. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Walk With Israel, with its 15,000 participants, each experiencing a personal journey, is an example of the experience economy. I carry memories from nearly three decades of walkathons, including years ago when I marched for a Russian refusenik.

Some of our community's offerings, however, continue to base themselves on the goods or service economies. Some schools see their role narrowly as producing knowledgeable students – prepared for bar mitzvah, proficient in Hebrew, loving Israel and knowledgeable of Bible. Some synagogues see their function as offering services – Shabbat service, counselling, funerals and education classes. The limited scope of these offerings misses the boat of the new economy.

Even attempts at innovation in these settings – the "synaplex" model, which offers choice within synagogues, such as young families services, reflective hikes or musical services, or schools that offer electives, allowing students to choose between classes such as Jews in film or Israeli music – bring us back to customization, idiomatic of the service economy, rather than personalization, a key aspect of the experience economy.

Pines and Gilmore urge organizations driven by the experience economy to think about what they would do differently if they charged admission. As a thought experiment, consider how we might transform Shabbat services if they were ticketed events? What would Hebrew school look like if admission were charged at the door?

Conceptualizing communal institutions as stagers of experiences, focused on creating memorable and moving personal experience, will enable us to build our market while emphasizing the spiritual and intellectual growth of each individual.

Local bachelor stars in reality web series

Michelle Bitran
Intern

He's tall, dark, handsome and single. Even better, he's Jewish and he's looking for love.

But instead of searching in the usual places, 30-year-old Nathaniel is starring as the real-life bachelor in Shalom Life's upcoming web series, The Bachelor 2012: Tall, Dark and Jewish.

Oh, and did I mention he has a British accent?

With the popularity of ABC's hit show The Bachelor, Jewish web news outlet Shalom Life, in partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Community Connect and El Al Airlines, decided it was time to have a Jewish bachelor, too.

Nathaniel, who works in health care and volunteers extensively in the Jewish community, was shocked when he got the call telling him he was the bachelor of choice. "I was really taken aback and my answer was an instant 'yes,'" he said.

Stephen Arbib, the founder of Shalom Life and one of the organizers of the competition, said Nathaniel came recommended to him through staff and volunteers at federation.

"We wanted someone that wasn't well-known in the community but was a great catch," Arbib said, adding that with a fairly "closed" Jewish community in Toronto, it was important to find someone that not everyone would immediately recognize.

London-born Nathaniel fit the bill perfectly. He came to Canada 10 years ago, lived in Montreal for seven years, and has only been in Toronto for the last three years. "I'd say Toronto is difficult because people like to stay within their groups," Nathaniel said of his dating luck so far in the city.

Needless to say, he was pleasantly surprised to see the dozens of applicants who want to meet him (sorry, ladies – the application deadline passed last month).

"The one thing that I've learned during this process is that there are so many people out there," Nathaniel said.

With the help of professional matchmaker Alison Green, he has narrowed down the pool of applicants to seven lucky ladies. He will go on a partially filmed date with each one, and the videos will be posted online for the community to watch, comment on and cast their votes.

From the top seven, Nathaniel will narrow it down to three, and eventually one. The new couple will go on a trip to Israel at the end of the summer to get to know each other better.

"I just really hope the community gets engaged and really loves it," Arbib said, adding that he plans to launch a Jewish bachelorette series in the winter, and to make both competitions annual.

For the moment, Nathaniel is preparing to meet the lucky seven with Green's expert advice. He said the insight into the dating world that she's provided has been very useful. "There's no class that teaches you how to date – you just kind of do it," he said, explaining the value of Green's help.

Nathaniel is hoping the competition will lead him to his future wife – a woman, he said, who should be kind, ambitious and charismatic.

The dates begin soon, and Nathaniel is gearing up for an adventurous summer. "I'm excited and nervous about it at the same time," he said.

For more information and to watch the date videos as they're posted, visit www.shalomlife.com.

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED TO COUNTER

During the summer months, missionary groups like Jews for Jesus take to the streets and target pedestrians with their proselytizing literature. In response, JEWS FOR JUDAISM is organizing a counter-leafletting campaign to alert and educate the public against this threat.

We need volunteers for a "Rapid Response Unit" of our Counter-Missionary Task Force to help this effort. JEWS FOR JUDAISM is seeking dedicated individuals who will act as "Spotters" – who will notify us if, when and where missionaries appear, or as "Counter-Leafletters" – who will distribute our counter-missionary literature in a non-confrontational manner on the street beside the missionaries.

If you would like to volunteer for our program and/or help support our vital work, please contact:

Concert supports disabled IDF veterans

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Disabled Israeli veterans were given a warm welcome at the Toronto Centre for the Arts on June 7. They came for the Celebration of Life concert tour held by Beit Halochem Canada – Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel.

"Tonight, we are really celebrating the lives of our brave guests," said Toby Feldberg, the president of Beit Halochem Canada, explaining the name chosen for the concert.

The annual tour visits Calgary, Montreal and Toronto to raise money for the Beit Halochem centres in Israel, which provide therapy and programming for Israel's 51,000 disabled Israel Defence Forces veterans and victims of terror and their families.

"Those who have given their bodies, their souls, their limbs for Israel – without them, there wouldn't be an Israel," said Lisa Levy, the executive director of Beit Halochem Canada.

Beit Halochem brings 10 disabled veterans to Canada each year for a two-week tour that overlaps with the concerts, allowing them to meet the Canadian Jewish community and to share their personal stories.

"The thing that they're most in awe about is that, 'Hey, there are people in Canada who actually care about me,'" said Levy, adding that for many, it is the first time they have travelled abroad alone since being injured.

This year, among those who shared their stories were Liftach Yaacov, who was injured in the Yom Kippur War and is the nephew of a former prime minister of Israel, Yitzhak Rabin, and Yarden Hershko, who lost the use of her legs while serving in the Karakal batallion.

Yaacov swims 70 laps in a Beit Halochem pool each morning, and Hershko is the only female player on Beit Halochem's wheelchair basketball team.

Beit Halochem members can play several sports adapted to suit their needs, including skiing, hand biking, wheelchair dancing and archery. Many even participate in the yearly Beit Halochem bike ride each October called Courage in Motion. The veterans can also take art classes, learn chess and sing in the choir, among many other activities.

The centres, in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa, Be'er Sheva and Nahariya, Levy explained, aim to keep the veterans physically active and to help them deal with the emotional pain of their injuries, including conditions such as post-traumatic stress disorder. They also provide activities for the veterans' families to socialize and support each other.

"We offer a place where they can go every single day," said Levy, adding that Beit Halochem representatives visit injured soldiers during their initial hospitalization to inform them of the options available to them at the centres.

The veterans at the Toronto concert told the audience how much the centres helped them to move on from their injuries. "It taught me how much happiness can come from things that seem so insignificant, like driving or shooting a basket [in basketball]," Hershko said.

The veterans were joined on stage by three Israeli musicians, Liron Lev, Gilan Shahaf and Shem Hamami, who entertained the crowd along with the wheelchair-dancing duo of veteran Yohai Touitou and Beit Halochem choreographer Yelena Feitliher.

At the Montreal concert, Beit Halochem honoured philanthropist David Azrieli in celebration of his 90th birthday. The Azrieli Foundation will be matching the funds raised throughout the concert tour in addition to its own contribution.

The money raised this year will be going toward the construction of a sixth Beit Halochem centre in Ashdod, where it will serve the 7,200 disabled veterans in the area.

Levy said Beit Halochem may exist for a sad reason, but the work that it does helps injured Israeli veterans to lead happy and fulfilling lives, even when many of them thought that it wouldn't be possible. "Every year we see people coming like broken doves and then soaring away."

Antisemitism in the shadow of war

Rebecca Bitton
Special to The CJN

York University faculty members, students and community members gathered earlier this month to celebrate the launch of a book titled Nazi Germany, Canadian Responses: Confronting Antisemitism in the Shadow of War.

The book is based on scholarly research compiled by B'nai Brith Canada's National Task Force on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research, an initiative backed and funded by the Canadian government.

Four of the contributors, professors Doris Bergen and Harold Troper of the University of Toronto, as well as University of British Columbia's Richard Menkis and York's Michael Brown, were on hand at the June 5 event to comment on the significance of the book and answer questions.

This book comes 30 years after historians Troper and Irving Abella penned None Is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe, 1933-1948, which focused on the governmental barriers that kept Jewish refugees out of the country in the years before, during and after World War II.

B'nai Brith Canada's national director Ruth Klein, editor of Nazi Germany, Canadian Responses, addressed the gathering first, and began by drawing attention to a significant date. "It is perhaps no coincidence that this evening's launch falls on the eve of an important anniversary," Klein began.

"June 6 is the day [in 1939] that the MS St. Louis had to turn back to Europe since country after country, including Canada, would not allow safe haven for its Jewish refugees on board."

Nazi Germany: Canadian Responses attempts to uncover the reasons behind Canada's attitude toward Jews in the years surrounding the war, by examining how much Canadians knew about the plight of the Jews at the time, how they responded to Adolf Hitler's rise to power and other questions. The book's contributors turned to media, literature, university campuses and community activist groups as sources of information. The research led to findings that revealed that Canadians responded to the horrific situation in Europe differently – some reacted with outrage, others indifference and others still with acquiescence.

History professor and Holocaust studies scholar Bergen said contributing to this project was challenging for her.

"Not only did I need to conduct research on Nazi Germany – that seemed fairly easy to me – but I had to focus on the connection to Canada, which, in many archives, I have never seen mention of Canada," Bergen said, adding that the Holocaust was "not about Canada."

In light of this, Bergen's contribution titled What I Learned about the Holocaust by Thinking about Canada, revealed that "the process of social death got reinforced from outside Germany. Jews were isolated and alone, not only in Germany but around the world."

Brown, co-editor of a 2003 book titled Not Written in Stone: Jews, Constitutions, and Constitutionalism in Canada, said that the social, political, and legislative barriers further reinforced the antisemitism many Canadians felt during the 1930s and 1940s.

Kulanu halts complaint process against QuAIA

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Toronto's main Jewish gay and lesbian organization says it won't proceed with a complaint against an anti-Zionist group that intends to march in this year's Pride Parade because the pro-Israel group contends the complaints process is biased.

Kulanu Toronto filed the complaint June 8 with the chair of Pride Toronto's new dispute resolution panel, lawyer Douglas Elliott, against Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA).

According to Justine Apple, Kulanu's executive director, Elliott received the complaint on Monday, June 11, and proceeded to forward the document to both the Toronto Star and Xtra, a gay and lesbian weekly newspaper. The latter then posted the full text of the document on its website, including Apple's personal contact information.

Xtra later took out Apple's personal information after she complained, but left the rest of the text online.

Nevertheless, Apple said Xtra went too far and that she felt "betrayed" by Elliott, whom she said Kulanu had previously trusted.

Referring to Pride's dispute resolution process, Apple said in a statement that as a result of the panel's actions, Kulanu believes the mechanism "is seriously tainted with bias."

"We feel that it is unfair, unprofessional, disrespectful, and has demonstrated poor judgment. It has lost our confidence and that of many others. We feel it is a discredited process by any reasonable standard."

Elliott was not available for an interview by The CJN's deadline. Apple said she was unaware that submissions to Pride's dispute resolution process would be made public.

The process was set up late last year as an outgrowth of the controversy surrounding QuAIA's presence in the parade since 2008.

Kulanu's complaint was the first to be filed with Pride Toronto's arms-length dispute panel. On June 7, Toronto city council voted to condemn the term "Israeli apartheid" as part of a compromise that saw it grant nearly $104,000 to this year's Pride festival without stipulating that QuAIA not take part. The group is scheduled to march in this year's Pride Parade on July 1. QuAIA didn't participate in Toronto's 2011 Pride Week, bowing to pressure from Pride organizers and the city's gay and lesbian community to ensure that the city's annual grant flowed to the festival after an acrimonious public debate threatened to see the city cut its funding.

Aside from feeling "violated" and "shocked" by the online publication of her personal information, Apple said she wondered how both the Star and Xtra knew to ask Elliott for copies of Kulanu's complaint form almost immediately after it was filed.

According to the rules of the dispute resolution process, once a complaint is registered with Pride Toronto, the group or person affected by the complaint is notified immediately.

Domestic violence can affect anyone, speaker says

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

For 29 years, Judy, now in her late 50s, lived what appeared to be an idyllic life.

Wife of a dentist, Judy (not her real name) had two sons, a beautiful home, and was able to travel a good deal.

About five years ago, however, she read a CJN article about domestic violence, and identified with the woman in the article. "I recognized myself," she said in an interview.

Judy, now divorced, is part of the speakers bureau co-ordinated by Act to End Violence Against Women and made up of women survivors and professionals in the Toronto area.

The goal of the speakers bureau is to educate the public about the widespread incidence of violence against women and to underline its impact by sharing real life, personal stories told by survivors of violence.

Judy said that from early on in her marriage, her husband blamed her for everything. "He made me the person responsible for all his actions. He swore at me and called me names.

"He manipulated me, and my self-esteem began to erode. He made me feel guilty, and I kept having to defend myself."

After reading the article, she said, she began to respond differently to his behaviour, "and his abuse increased. When he began intercepting my e-mail, though, that was the last straw."

Judy said that until she met Penny Krowitz, executive director of Act to End Violence Against Women, Judy did not consider herself abused. "Like many people, I thought abuse had to be physical. I didn't realize there is all kinds of abuse."

Krowitz, whose organization offers workshops, educational materials and programs on dating abuse and violence against women, said that people do not recognize the subtle nature of abuse and how it affects psyches. "Abuse can be verbal, sexual, financial, emotional – abuse is abuse, and no group is immune."

> Like many people, I thought abuse had to be physical. I didn't realize there is all kinds of abuse

Abuse is an imbalance of power, she said, and it is unjust. "[Our mandate] is to help women live safe and secure lives."

Judy said she joined the organization's speakers bureau because she wanted to put a face on abuse. "It's a disease that can affect anyone. Penny validated me, and gave me a place to talk. It is a powerful way to spread the word. When someone hears me, they say, 'It could be me.'

"I am one of the lucky ones who got out. My lifestyle changed drastically, but I have peace. It feels like 29 years were wiped out of my life, and I do get lonely sometimes, but no one yells at me anymore. I have no regrets."

" תמיד השתדלתי לתת לה מה שהיא רוצה, לשמור על בית כשר ולכבד את השבת. והשיא היה ביום הנישואים ה- 25 כשלקחתי אותה לטיול נפלא לישראל!"

ענה לו איציק ללא היסוס:

"אני נוסע לישראל להביא אותה חזרה".....

Parliament calls on IOC for moment of silence

Compiled by CJN Staff

The House of Commons last week unanimously adopted a motion that calls on the International Olympic Committee (IOC) to hold a moment of silence at the 2012 London Olympics in memory of the 11 Israeli athletes and coaches killed by terrorists 40 years ago at the Games in Munich.

With adoption of the motion, the Canadian Parliament became the first in the world to call for a moment of remembrance.

That move came after John Baird, minister of foreign affairs, and Bal Gosal, minister of state for sport, wrote to IOC president Jacques Rogge supporting Israel's request for a minute of silence. Baird also phoned Rogge last week to express "strong support" for an official commemoration, a foreign affairs spokesperson stated.

The IOC has consistently refused Israel's request, saying it has paid tribute to the athletes on other occasions. Palestinian Black September terrorists murdered the athletes after invading the athletes' village.

Irwin Cotler

Liberal justice and human rights critic Irwin Cotler proposed the House motion. Following its passage, Cotler told Parliament, "Civil society groups and political leaders around the world have been calling on the IOC to hold a moment of silence at the opening ceremony of the London Games. I am delighted that the Canadian Parliament is the first to unanimously support this call.

"The adoption of this motion is part of our responsibility to remember the victims of this terrorist assault 40 years ago – the duty of memory. I am pleased that all parties have worked together in common cause and hope the IOC will accede to our request."

Earlier, Baird and Gosal had urged Rogge to reconsider the IOC rejection of Israel's request for a moment of silence, "given the gravity of the events that took place in Munich in 1972.

"This terrorist attack targeted not only Israel but the spirit and goals of the Olympic movement. Given the impact of this tragedy, on the Olympic community as a whole and the world, it should be marked publicly as part of the official opening ceremony of the games, not just by the Israeli delegation," the letter states.

In Australia, meanwhile, Prime Minister Julia Gillard was joined by opposition leader Tony Abbott, state premiers and other dignitaries in calling on the IOC to hold a minute of silence.

Rogge has rejected Israel's suggestion that the Munich tragedy should be recognized during the opening ceremony. He has said that he would attend a special service in London and that IOC officials would attend memorials organized by the Israelis.

DID THE LOSS OF A FAMILY MEMBER BEFORE JUNE 14, 2010, RESULT IN A CORONER'S INVESTIGATION AND AUTOPSY?

IF SO, IT IS POSSIBLE THAT AN ORGAN WAS RETAINED AFTER AUTOPSY AND KEPT FOR FURTHER TESTING.

When deaths are investigated, pathologists sometimes retain an organ to help determine the cause of death.

In the past, family members may not have been notified that an organ had been retained. Now, families are routinely notified when an organ is retained and their wishes regarding final disposition of the organ are sought wherever possible.

The Ontario Forensic Pathology Service is reaching out to anyone for whom the loss of a family member before June 14, 2010, resulted in a coroner's investigation and autopsy.

Immediate family members and personal representatives (i.e. those responsible for administering an estate) are invited to contact us to find out if an organ was retained in their case.

Affected families and personal representatives may request that the organ be sent to a funeral home for cremation or burial. Expenses will be covered by the Ontario Forensic Pathology Service and the Office of the Chief Coroner.

Organs retained before June 14, 2010, will be respectfully disposed of beginning on June 14, 2013. This is in accordance with regulations made under the Coroners Act.

Jewish groups welcome curbing of Nazi salute

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Quebec student leaders say they will try to curb anti-tuition hike demonstrators from using the Nazi salute again.

Both B'nai Brith Canada and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) denounced the gesture last week as unacceptable and insensitive to Jews and others, whatever the intention of those who do it.

A relatively small number of young people raising their arms straight out, and sometimes goose-stepping, has been observed occasionally at the demonstrations, which began in March and sometimes attract thousands.

However, the impact of the salute has been magnified by the circulation of images on the Internet.

The saluting has been directed at police as a taunt, to say that demonstrators believe the police are acting like fascists. The French acronym of the Montreal police department, SSPVM, is also said to have provoked the Nazi mockery.

Martine Desjardins, president of the largest student group organizing the daily protests, mainly in downtown Montreal, contacted both B'nai Brith and CIJA to apologize immediately after the two groups voiced their objections.

She said she understands how hurtful this reminder of the horror of World War II is and that it has no place in the students' campaign.

The demonstrations have expanded to include a denunciation of Bill 78, the emergency legislation enacted in May to quell the social unrest, and general discontent with the government.

Desjardins heads the largest student organization in the province, the Fédération étudiante universitaire du Québec (FEUQ). Speaking via Twitter, the much smaller and generally considered most radical of the student groups, CLASSE, also urged an end to any mimicking of Nazi gestures.

"Regardless of the intentions, it is deeply offensive to Jews and non-Jews," said David Ouellette, CIJA's associate director for Quebec public affairs. "It defiles the memory of the Holocaust and is an assault on Quebec society, which lives by the rule of law."

He added that it "reflects a disturbing lack of awareness of the true nature of Nazism… But our understanding is that it does not express sympathy for Nazism. We will be monitoring the situation."

Ouellette said he is grateful for Desjardins having responded "quickly and unambiguously" to condemn the Nazi imagery.

But he said it's not surprising, because CIJA and its predecessor organizations have maintained a good relationship with FEUQ, and its members have taken part in organized trips to Israel and the Jewish community's Fête nationale receptions, for example.

B'nai Brith CEO Frank Dimant also welcomed the swift apology and assurance from Desjardins that she will make every effort to curtail this behaviour.

"We reiterate our call to all other Quebec student organizations, protest groups and individual students to refrain from hateful gestures that have caused shock and outrage throughout the Jewish community and are tremendously offensive to all Canadians."

Focused now on school

"I love speaking… because at the first year at the relay when I spoke during the luminary ceremony, someone contacted my mom afterwards and said… she used parts of my speech to speak to her son when he got diagnosed and it inspired him, so that was rewarding."

Although Levine is cancer-free, she said she still has some bad days.

"I'm still so tired, either from the surgery or the radioactive iodine treatment – we don't really know what's causing it. But I still get really tired and some days it's hard to get out of bed, and my immune system is a lot lower so I get frequent infections, one after another after another."

Since her recovery is taking a little longer than she anticipated, she decided to take a year off before enrolling in university to fully recuperate.

But Levine, who maintained a 95 per cent average before she started getting sick, isn't letting her recovery keep her from volunteering and giving back to her community.

"I volunteer at my synagogue, Temple Anshe Shalom, and I've been involved with both the youth groups," she said, adding that she was on the executive for both the Temple Anshe Shalom Cool Crew, as well as the Temple Anshe Shalom teen youth group.

"Also, at school, there's a social action club called Haven and I've been involved for all four years of high school."

She said the group organizes fundraisers and food drives for non-profit groups.

But for now, Levine is focusing her attention on graduating from high school and reaching her goal for the Canadian Cancer Society.

"I would be so grateful to anyone who'd be willing to donate, and I hope together we can find a cure for cancer."

Alleged assault charges; splitting RRSPs; hemlines.

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 31 years

Question: I recently have been unfairly charged by the police for allegedly assaulting my wife. The charges are ludicrous. But I have been excluded from the matrimonial home pending the hearing of the charges. The children live at home with her. Does this mean she now has custody of them?

Answer: Absolutely not. However, it does put you in a very disadvantageous position. As time goes by and the children continue to live in the home where they have been normally residing, the status quo of that home being their appropriate place of residence is reinforced. It is imperative that failing negotiations to reassert your position as an 'equal parent' with perhaps something approaching equal time with the children, you consider court action to obtain as much time with the children as possible.

The children's relationship with you should not have to change, especially if you are truly innocent of these charges. Unfortunately, given the reality of the justice system, it takes so long for the charges to be disposed of, that by the time it happens your relationship with them may well be negatively affected.

If mediation with the mother fails it may be important to contact a qualified and competent family law lawyer to ensure that the Court understands the need for the children to have as much contact with their father as possible, no matter how strained the relationship between their parents may be.

Question: My wife and I are separating. I have RRSPs that I do not wish to cash but that I do wish to split with my wife now that we are going our separate ways. However, I am afraid to do so because of the tax consequences. Once I've cashed an RRSP, I then have to bring it into my income for that calendar year. What do you advise?

Answer: Canada's Income Tax Act permits a transfer tax free of any portion of your RRSPs to your spouse on separation if it is provided for in a properly drafted separation agreement and if you sign a prescribed form it has for that purpose. You can obtain this form online or from any office of the Canada Revenue Agency and file it with your tax return.

You would be wise to consult a competent family law lawyer before proceeding. These RRSPs are only one of many details that should comprise your separation agreement. Unless you're prepared to study family law for several years, it's best to let an expert handle it.

If the answer to your RRSP question comes as a pleasant surprise, a consultation with a family law lawyer may well yield pleasant surprises about other details of your separation or divorce. At the very least, it will help prevent the unpleasant surprises that often result from a well-intentioned but ill-advised "do-it-yourself" agreement.

Question: My wife has sole custody, but I don't like the way she allows my 14-year-old daughter to dress in very immodest clothing, even though her school allows it. I have complained to my ex about her lack of proper attire several times. I am terrified my daughter will become pregnant one day. Is there anything I can do about this?

Answer: No, you cannot. Any intervention on your part could result in legal action against you. Being loving and supportive to the degree you can, within the parameters of your separation or divorce agreement — and setting an example of modesty in your own lifestyle — is probably a more productive approach.

Camp Massad celebrates its 60th anniversary

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Camp Massad, the only Hebrew-immersion summer camp in Western Canada, is celebrating its 60th anniversary.

Former campers and counsellors are invited to come and celebrate the anniversary at an alumni reunion from Aug. 24 to 26.

"We are anticipating between 100 and 150 people will come out for the weekend," said Hart Jacob, a member of the reunion's planning committee and a former Massad program director.

Capacity at the camp, which is located about a 45-minute drive north of Winnipeg, is 170.

Camp director Daniel Sprintz said that almost every former program director and numerous former counsellors and campers have already signed up for the reunion, eager to sing old cabin songs, debate Maccabiah scores, dance to Rikudei Am, and write and perform shtick for Café ben Leumi.

Massad has, from the beginning, offered a camping experience unlike any other Jewish camp in Western Canada. First of all, it is a Hebrew-immersion camp. The camping experience also features such traditional camping activities as swimming, hiking and a variety of sports.

Massad grew out of the Talmud Torah Hebrew School and Zionist youth groups. The campsite at Winnipeg Beach was originally a Habonim camp. With the founding of the State of Israel, most of the Habonim leadership were anticipating making aliyah.

One of the Habonim youths, Soody Kleiman, had spent nine months in Israel, where he had learned about two Hebrew-speaking camps that were both Camp Massads – in Pennsylvania – and he felt that one could work for Winnipeg as well.

On his return to Winnipeg in 1952 before making aliyah, Kleiman and some friends were able to get support from the leadership of the Karen Hatarbut organization (Labour Zionists) in Winnipeg for a Hebrew-immersion camp.

Among Kleiman's most important supporters was Rabbi Abraham Kravetz, the principal of Talmud Torah, who promoted the new camp among his students. "Our Habonim camp had always kept kosher," Kleiman said. "And we had a Shabbat service."

Kleiman became the new camp's first senior counsellor and program director. Ed Yuditsky, the principal of the Talmud Torah in Regina, became the camp's first director.

Leona Billinkoff was recruited to be the first administrator. Billinkoff had been a volunteer at Talmud Torah and had impressed Rabbi Kravitz with her abilities. She turned out to be an inspired choice to lead Massad. She served in that role for 25 years and left her stamp on Massad.

It was also helpful that Billinkoff's late husband, Alec, was a builder by profession. He helped build up the camp's physical infrastructure.

"The programs we set up are little changed to this day," said Kleiman, still vigorous as he nears 80. "I am delighted that the camp has succeeded so well."

Kleiman did make aliyah in 1954, but returned to Winnipeg with a wife and young family four years later. He said that his only involvement with the camp after returning to Winnipeg was through his sons.

The reunion will focus on the creative side of Massad, Jacob said. That includes sing-alongs and Israeli dance and skits and songs in the evenings, as well as Shabbat dinner and services. During the day, former campers and staff will take part in water and sports activities. Reunion participants will be in cabins with their peers.

For more information about the reunion, call 204-477-7487 or e-mail info@campmassad.ca.

CJA donors lose option to allocate funds

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg will no longer allow contributors to the annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign to allocate their own donations.

Donors have been allocating their gifts between the community and Israel for nearly 40 years, but local leaders have decided to stop the practice. With this change, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg falls in line with other federations in North America.

"Our allocation of funds raised has been based on community needs since day one," said Bob Freedman, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's longtime CEO. "Each of our local beneficiaries makes a presentation to the allocations committee, which is chaired by the federation board treasurer. The committee members are representatives from all walks of Winnipeg Jewish life, and they take their responsibilities very seriously.

"This year's committee will be the last to deal only with local needs. Effective with the 2012 campaign, our community's donors will make their gift to the annual campaign, and the 2013 allocations committee will distribute funding to local, national and overseas needs. The process will be expanded to include a presentation from Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA on behalf of national and overseas beneficiaries. In effect, the number of beneficiary presentations will go from 11 to 12."

The allocations process is rigorous, and designed to provide donors with confidence that their annual gift is being well spent, he added. Each beneficiary must prove appropriate fiscal responsibility and effective stewardship of the community's money. Donors can now expect that level of confidence to extend to agencies supporting Jews in need around the world.

Winnipeg's "two-line" card dates back to 1974, when the United Israel Appeal and the Community Council combined forces to better meet the needs of the Jewish community at home and away.

Freedman notes that letters have been sent out to all past CJA donors, explaining the change in policy.

"We are encouraging people who have questions or concerns to call us now," he said. "Any time there is a major change, there are some people who want to know what's behind it. We would rather that people ask now instead of when our canvassers are calling."

The letters were sent out near the end of May. So far, there have only been a half-dozen calls, Freedman said.

Over the past few campaigns, the split between the percentage of donations to the local community and funds going to Israel and overseas has been constant at about 70-30. Freedman isn't expecting the allocation split to change dramatically as a result of eliminating the two-line card.

"We just feel that having our allocations committee responsible for all the monies raised makes the process more accountable and transparent," Freedman said. "We are still in discussions with [Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA] Canada about how the new process will work."

He said the new system will give the Winnipeg CJA more flexibility in responding to overseas needs. "If Birthright comes to us asking for more funding, for example, our allocations committee can consider the request," he added. — M.L.

Israel moves tanks to border with Egypt

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel reportedly moved tanks close to the border with Egypt on Monday after a cross-border attack in which an Israeli civilian was killed.

The move was in violation of the Camp David accords. The tanks were later withdrawn from the area, Ha'aretz reported.

The terrorists detonated an explosive device Monday morning near two Israeli vehicles carrying contractors who are working on the border fence between Israel and Egypt. Gunfire was also directed at the vehicles, according to the Israel Defence Forces.

Three terrorists had infiltrated into Israel in a place where the border fence is not yet complete. Some terrorists remained on the Egyptian side of the border, the IDF said.

The incident took place near the Philadelphi Corridor, a narrow strip of land along the border between the Gaza Strip and Egypt.

Golani Brigade soldiers who arrived at the scene within minutes of the incident opened fire on the terrorists, killing two. One of the terrorists was carrying a large explosive device that went off after he was fired upon, according to the IDF. No terrorists remain inside Israel, Brig.-Gen Yoav Mordechai of the IDF spokespersons unit said.

The attack came a day after two long-range Grad missiles fired from the Sinai Peninsula were discovered in southern Israel.

"We see here a disturbing deterioration in Egyptian control in the Sinai," Defence Minister Ehud Barak said Monday during a meeting with his Polish counterpart, Tomasz Siemoniak, in Tel Aviv. "We are waiting for the results of the election. Whoever wins, we expect them to take responsibility for all of Egypt's international commitments, including the peace treaty with Israel and the security arrangements in the Sinai, swiftly putting an end to these attacks."

IDF troops returned later Monday to the scene of the attack to retrieve the terrorists' bodies, according to reports. A helmet, a vest, uniforms and Kalashnikov rifles were found near the terrorists.

The Israel-Egypt border project currently employs 1,500 workers, according to Ynet.

Muslim Brotherhood claims victory in Egypt

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAIRO — The Muslim Brotherhood declared early Monday that its candidate, Mohammed Morsi, won Egypt's presidential election.

Meanwhile, the Egyptian military gave itself the lion's share of power over the new president, enshrining its hold on the state and sharpening the possibility of confrontation with the Islamists.

With parliament dissolved and martial law in force, the generals made themselves the country's lawmakers, gave themselves control over the budget and will determine who writes the permanent constitution that will define the country's future.

But as they claimed victory over Hosni Mubarak's last prime minister Ahmed Shafiq in the election, the Brotherhood challenged the military's power grab. The group warned that it did not recognize the dissolution of parliament or the military's interim constitution – or its right to oversee the drafting of a new one.

That pointed to a potential struggle over spheres of authority between Egypt's two strongest forces. The Brotherhood has campaigned on a platform of bringing Egypt closer to a form of Islamic rule, but the military's grip puts it in a position to block that. Instead any conflict would likely centre on more basic questions of power. At a pre-dawn press conference Monday declaring their win, officials from the fundamentalist group that was banned for decades and repeatedly subjected to crackdowns under Mubarak's rule were ebullient and smiling, as supporters chanted, "Down with military rule."

"Thank God who guided the people of Egypt to this right path, the path of freedom and democracy," Morsi told the crowd at his campaign headquarters in his first appearance since the victory claim.

Final official results are not expected until Thursday. The Brotherhood's declaration was based on results announced by election officials at individual counting centres, where each campaign has representatives who compile the numbers and make them public before the formal announcement. The Brotherhood's early, partial counts proved generally accurate in last month's first-round vote.

The group said Morsi took 51.8 per cent of the vote to Shafiq's 48.1 per cent out of 24.6 million votes cast, with 98 per cent of the more than 13,000 poll centres counted. Morsi is the "first civilian, popularly elected Egyptian president," the Brotherhood proclaimed on its website. There was no immediate comment from the Shafiq campaign.

The question now will be how a Brotherhood president will get along with the military generals who have ruled since Mubarak fell on Feb. 11, 2011, and who will still hold powers that can potentially paralyze Morsi.

The Brotherhood has reached accommodations with the generals at times over the past 16 months, as it struck deals with Mubarak's regime, gaining the Brotherhood a reputation among critics as willing to sell out for a taste of authority.

But after a highly polarized presidential election and the miltary's arrogation of powers to itself, the Brotherhood presented itself as willing to get into a confrontation with the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, the body of top generals headed by Field Marshall Hussein Tantawi, Mubarak's defence minister for 20 years.

Just before the election, the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, which has ruled since Mubarak's fall, slapped de facto martial law on the country, giving military police and intelligence agents the right to arrest civilians for a host of suspected crimes, some as secondary as obstructing traffic.

Neo-Nazi party still strong in Greek elections

JTA

ATHENS, Greece — The neo-Nazi Golden Dawn party maintained its strength, winning nearly seven per cent of the vote in the Greek national elections last Sunday.

The fascist party, with its Nazi swastika-like flag and Holocaust-denying leader, leapt to prominence when it entered the Greek Parliament for the first time in the inconclusive elections six weeks ago.

The conservative New Democracy Party, which supports Greece staying in the European Union and honouring its commitments under bailouts it received, won the most votes and will likely form the new government.

Polls and Greek commentators had predicted that support for Golden Dawn would drop in Sunday's election, saying the original vote was a protest against the established political parties held responsible for Greece's economic crisis. However, the party's support dropped only fractionally, from 6.97 per cent to 6.92 per cent in results released Monday. This will give the party 19 lawmakers in the 300-member Parliament.

"It shows we were all wrong and that this is the real percentage of people who support them with their anti-illegal immigrant policy and their Nazi style that they show the people," David Saltiel, president of the Central Board of Jewish Communities in Greece, told JTA.

"It is a problem for Greek democracy and we have to see how the parties will react. We hope they will isolate them," he said. Golden Dawn had campaigned on an anti-austerity, anti-immigrant platform, preying on the fears of ordinary Greeks who have seen their neighbourhoods overrun by the nearly 1 million immigrants who have flooded the country from Asia and Africa hoping to use it as a gateway to the European Union.

After the first election, Golden Dawn leader Nikolaos Michaloliakos — who came to prominence when he won a seat on the Athens City Council in 2010 and celebrated by giving the Nazi salute at the first City Hall meeting — gave an interview in which he denied the existence of gas chambers at Nazi death camps.

Trying to 'demystify' the book

Anyone who wants to read the book can download a copy anyway, he noted, and its ban "probably even raises the fascination with Hitler among some teens."

Actually, it's "a very boring book and no kid will like to read it," said political scientist Thomas Lutz, who heads the memorial museums department of the Topography of Terror Foundation at the site of the former Gestapo headquarters in Berlin. "A special edition may be helpful as a further possibility to deal with the Nazi period, but I would not overestimate its impact."

Hitler wrote his rant against Jews and communists while in prison in 1923 following his attempted coup in Munich. After he came to power in 1933, many editions were published, including one given free to newlywed couples and one to mark Hitler's 50th birthday in 1939.

"The Nazis tried to put the book everywhere," said historian Christian Hartmann of the Institute for Contemporary History, which is advising the state's Agency for Civic Education on the educational excerpts.

Following World War II, the Bavarian Finance Ministry inherited the copyright from the publisher, and until now, it has barred publication in Germany in an effort to limit the spread of Hitler's ideology. But that does not stop publication elsewhere.

"Of course, Hitler is a fascinosum," an object of fascination, Hartmann said. "Evil is always fascinating, and you can't prevent that." Accordingly, the book "is one of the most purchased in the world – more than 12 million copies have been sold. Here, where it was banned, people have read it secretly.

"What we are trying to do is demystify Mein Kampf and make it what it is: a historical source and nothing more," Hartmann added.

Amid Hitler's inaccurate accounts of personal and world history are hints of what would come, he said. "Such things as the Holocaust, the attack on the Soviet Union, relations with France and Italy, attempts to form a union with Great Britain – these are in the book. It is a kind of master plan for his later deeds."

Documentary evidence of those deeds can be seen at the House of the Wannsee Conference in Potsdam, just outside Berlin. On a glass-topped display table in a ground-floor room are facsimiles of the minutes of the meeting of Jan. 20, 1942, where the "Final Solution" was mapped out. Adolf Eichmann wrote the protocol.

"In the course of the practical implementation of the final solution, Europe will be combed through from west to east," Eichmann wrote in one section. "Any first-degree mischling [person with one Jewish parent] to be exempted from evacuation will be sterilized in order to prevent any progeny… State Secretary Dr. Buhler… had only one favour to ask: that the Jewish question in this territory be resolved as fast as possible."

People "could have known" what was coming if they read Mein Kampf, said teacher Annette Zschatzsch, looking at the display with her students.

"But people did not read it."

As for whether it would be useful for students to read the book, David, 17, said he thought it would be good for students aged 16 and older to have access to explanations and a "watered-down version."

Zschatzsch, who graduated high school in 1984, noted that she and her classmates also were able to read parts of Mein Kampf excerpted in textbooks, "but the degree to which it was used depended on the individual teacher."

Canadian helps African refugees in Israel

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Lilah Jaffee came to Israel for some hands-on humanitarian experience and found it as a volunteer at the African Refugee Development Center (ARDC).

"When I came to Israel, I didn't even know there was an African refugee problem. I thought I'd be helping asylum seekers get refugee status, but that's not the case," Jaffee told The CJN. "What I thought I was getting into and what I do are completely different. But this has been the most amazing internship for me."

Jaffee, 25, who has an MA in international affairs from Carleton University, is in Tel Aviv on MASA's Career Israel program. The initiative offers young people from around the world the opportunity to enrol in an internship in Israel.

The ARDC is a non-profit organization founded in 2004 by refugees and Israeli citizens to assist and support refugees and asylum seekers in Israel. There are approximately 60,000 African migrants in Israel.

When Jaffee started her four-month internship, she was working to help refugees leave Israel and resettle in Canada or Australia on the basis of humanitarian sponsorship.

Not all the Africans she has met, she said, are interested in staying in Israel. Many see Tel Aviv as a way station to better promised lands.

"But midway through my internship, we realized that Australia hadn't accepted anyone and Canada had only accepted seven people from Israel. It seemed like all our work was not paying off," she said.

Now, she is trying to help asylum seekers reunite with their families in Europe or North America. She said one case she was working on involves a man from Sudan who says his wife was resettled by the United Nations in the United States.

"The stories we hear are how they feel unwanted, that they feel they deserve rights that they aren't getting. Overall, there's a lot of anger and frustration and disappointment at how their lives have turned out. It's hard not to sympathize with them," Jaffee said.

And though she could have stayed in Canada to work with refugees, Jaffee says she chose to come to Israel because her Birthright trip here in 2008 left her wanting to return.

So, she signed up to intern at the ARDC. The centre's office is located in Tel Aviv's Old Bus Station, at the heart of the migrant workers' community.

Lilah Jaffee

Jaffee's internship has afforded her a taste of both Tel Avivs – that of the migrants and that of other residents. A 20-minute bus ride from the ARDC office takes Jaffee to her rented apartment in downtown Tel Aviv, which is a walk away from the beach, bars, theatres, designer stores, cafés and restaurants.

"I love Tel Aviv. I think it's one of my favourite cities," she said. "I live right in the middle of everything."

And while she is quick to praise Israel for its outgoing lifestyle, when she returns to the offices of ARDC, she is equally as swift to object to Israel's course of action toward the African migrants.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu recently ordered his ministers to accelerate efforts to deport citizens of South Sudan, the Ivory Coast, Ghana and Ethiopia who are living in Israel illegally. He said that while it's not possible to expel refugees whose lives would be at risk in their home countries, holding facilities for them must be built in the Negev as quickly as possible.

"Israel is not doing a good job. No country has had a perfect record for dealing with refugees, but Israel needs to do better. It needs to figure out a policy," said Jaffee, who hopes to continue working with refugees upon her return to Canada.

Asked about Canada's infamous "none is too many" policy during World War II, Europe's tendency to turn away African boat people before they even touch land and the Egyptians shooting migrants along their border, Jaffee said that the Israel Defence Forces has been "really receptive and good to them. I think there is a magnifying glass on Israel. But still Israel needs to do better."

Orthodox fuel NYC Jewish population growth

JTA

NEW YORK — The New York City area's Jewish population is growing, in large part due to its Orthodox community, a comprehensive study has found.

There are 1.54 million Jews living in 694,000 Jewish households in New York City and three suburban counties, an increase of nine per cent between 2002 and 2011, according to the Jewish Community Study of New York: 2011. The figures in the study, released last week, show the New York area with the largest Jewish population anywhere outside of Israel.

The study, sponsored by UJA-Federation of New York, was conducted from Feb. 8, 2011, to July 10, 2011 by Jewish Policy & Action Research, led by Dr. Steven Cohen. Some 5,993 self-identifying Jewish adults from New York City and suburban Nassau, Suffolk and Westchester counties were interviewed by telephone. The poll's margin of error is plus or minus two per cent.

According to the study, 32 per cent of the New York area's Jews are Orthodox. Orthodox households are home to 61 per cent of all Jewish children in the New York area.

The total number of Jewish children and young adults under the age of 25 has grown by 66,000 since 2002. Meanwhile, the number of Jewish senior citizens also has risen since 2002, with 45,000 more Jews age 75 and above.

Some 361,000 people – both Jews and non-Jews – live in poor Jewish households, defined by the study as having an income of under 150 per cent of the federal poverty line. Some 43 per cent of chassidic households are identified as poor.

On the subject of Jewish engagement, the numbers of Orthodox and nondenominational Jews each increased by more than 100,000 over the past decade, while the numbers of Conservative and Reform Jews each decreased by about 40,000. Twenty-two per cent of married couples are intermarried, and some 40 per cent of non-Orthodox married couples are intermarried. Of the non-Orthodox couples married in the past five years, 50 per cent are intermarried.

Schalit a sports columnist

Gilad Schalit has found his calling for now, accepting a position as sports columnist for Israeli daily Yediot Achronot. Schalit, who was abducted by Gaza militants in 2006 while serving in the Israel Defence Forces and held captive for more than five years, is an avid basketball fan and Maccabi Tel Aviv fan and has even attended a workout with the team. He also attended the NBA All-Star game in Orlando, Fla., in February. Schalit told family and friends that during his captivity, his guards allowed him to view sports on TV, something he said helped him pass the time and keep his mind active.

No pardon for Pollard

The White House reiterated last week that it has no intention of releasing Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard on humanitarian grounds amid Israeli President Shimon Peres' Washington visit to receive the Presidential Medal of Freedom. Peres asked U.S. President Barack Obama for Pollard's release during a private meeting the same day, and Obama reportedly "did not close the door" on the idea.

Forbes names richest rabbis

Forbes Israel has released a list of the 12 richest rabbis in Israel. The richest is Rabbi Pinchas Abuhatzeira, 36, who lives in Be'er Sheva with his wife and five children. His estimated wealth is NIS 1.3 billion ($334,947,000).

Israeli singer popular in Iran

Despite political tension between Israel and Iran, an Iranian-Israeli singer has gained significant popularity among music lovers in the Islamic Republic. Rita Jahanforuz was born in Iran but immigrated to Israel as a child. As one of Israel's most famous singers, she's known simply as Rita in the Jewish state. Her latest album, All My Joys, reinvents Persian songs in a Mediterranean style popular among Israelis. The album went gold in Israel in three weeks, but also became secretly popular among Iranians.

Canadians invited to invest in Israeli infrastructure

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When attorney Yehudah Raveh considers the opportunity he's offering investors and compares it to the alternatives available to high net-worth individuals, he feels as if he's got a leg up on the competition.

These are difficult times all over the world, yet Israel, for all its political and security issues, boasts a thriving economy and lots of public spending, he said. In the next few years, the government is poised to spend at least $8 billion, perhaps as much as $12 billion (all figures US) on major infrastructure projects, and the private sector is invited to get in on the action.

Enter the Israeli Infrastructure Fund (IIF), a limited partnership Raveh co-founded in 2007. It pools the capital of foreign and Israeli contributors, and invests it in various companies that develop and operate infrastructure projects.

In its first phase, the IIF invested $845 million in a half-dozen projects, including a major highway, a power plant and a gas pipeline. That fund is now closed but a second fund, IIF II, will follow the lead of the first and invest in companies that will bid on infrastructure projects, Raveh said.

Yehuda Raveh

Zale Newman

And there are some big ones coming soon. The government of Israel is planning to move most of its military training centres to the Negev Desert, fulfilling David Ben-Gurion's dream of populating Israel's south. Some $2.5 billion has been allocated for that, said Raveh, whose expertise is in project finance.

IIF II has already invested in Hayovel Lines Ltd., which has a contract to design, build, operate and maintain Road 431, which runs south of Tel Aviv to Modi'in, for 25 years.

Another investment is in Derech Eretz, which won a contract to build, operate and maintain Highway 6 for 30 years.

Projects on the horizon include a light-rail system for Tel Aviv, with an estimated cost of $3.5 billion; a railway linking Eilat to the country's centre that will run in the neighbourhood of $2.5 billion; a new airport to be constructed just outside Eilat.

"I'm here to meet high net-worth individuals who are capable or agreeable to invest $5 million or more in our fund," Raveh said during a recent visit to Toronto.

He acknowledges the $5 million could be a barrier to some, and that's where Zale Newman comes in. Newman is president of Bond Street Mercantile, a firm that makes investments in Israeli infrastructure accessible more broadly.

Bond Street has created the Canada-Israel Infrastructure Fund, a limited partnership that serves as "a feeder fund that puts together a group of smaller investors who bring together the $5 million," he said.

Open to accredited investors, each is asked to put up at least $100,000.

"Anybody who loves Israel should put a percentage of their assets in Israel," perhaps one-10th, Newman said.

"We're looking for investments that are steady, low risk with good returns," he added.

He chose the IIF as a vehicle for Israeli investments because of its five-year track record as the "oldest and largest infrastructure fund in Israel."

"This limited partnership in Canada gives the average investor the chance to partner with the biggest investors… Every doctor is a candidate, every major Jewish philanthropist is a candidate," he said.

In effect, they can piggyback on the knowledge and contacts of well-connected Israeli players. IIF is co-managed by a company controlled by Raveh, by Harel Insurance, one of the country's largest insurance and finance groups, and Yaron Kestenbaum, formerly director of the Public Private Partnership Projects division in the Israel Ministry of Finance.

"Less than one per cent of Canadian Jews have an investment in Israel," said Newman. "We're trying to strengthen this connection to Israel and give them a good return."

The investments offer a lower risk and are safer than the Canadian stock market or real estate, he said.

IIF II closes in August, Newman said. "When they invest, the goal is to sell off within five years."

In the best-case scenario, investors receive their capital back, a capital gain as well as an income stream for the duration of the investment, Newman said.

Bond Street also offers other funds that invest in Israel.

If Raveh is unfamiliar to many Canadians, Canadians are quite familiar to Raveh.

"The law firm has long been connected with Canada," he said. "We represented Canadian Pacific when they had business in Israel and Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan [when it acquired] an interest in Israel Chemicals, and some individuals."

"My first involvement with infrastructure was 15 years ago when I was approached by the chairman and CEO of Aecon Construction."

That firm had participated in the construction of Highway 407 in the Toronto area, and they intended to participate in a tender to build a toll road in Israel, he said.

Aecon won the bid. "Our firm and me personally have been very much identified with infrastructure, and we developed a well-known expertise on infrastructure projects," Raveh said.

His "good friend" Yair Hamburger, whose family owns about half of Harel Insurance, approached him in 2007 to put together an infrastructure fund.

In its five years of existence, the IIF has earned annual returns of more than 19 per cent, Raveh stated.

A graphic celebration of Yiddish culture

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

In lieu of baseball cards, some American Orthodox boys have turned in recent decades to collecting Torah personality trading cards that feature images of revered gedolim (giants) from Moses Maimonides to Rabbi Moishe Feinstein, with lists of famous published works on the back in lieu of batting statistics. The happy invention of a Baltimore accountant, Torah Personalities cards have been available (in packs, but minus the bubble gum) since 1989. Rare cards reportedly sell for hundreds of dollars.

The devolution of high-minded rabbinical lore into the arena of popular American culture has a certain parallel in the recent publication of Yiddishkeit: Jewish Vernacular & The New Land (Harry N. Abrams), a collection of graphic writing about Yiddish culture edited by Harvey Pekar and Paul Buhle.

Pekar, who died in July 2010, has become a sort of "Gedolim" in his own right. A self-admitted "shlump" who led a lonely existence as a lowly file clerk in Cleveland, he teamed up with R. Crumb and other comic-book artists to transform the dross of his life into gold. Using stick figures, he wrote and drew short autobiographical pieces that the artists spun into American Splendor, a wondrously ironic and highly popular comic-book series.

When the eponymous movie came out in 2003 with Paul Giametti playing Pekar, it completed the latter's transformation from zero to hero and brought him a measure of success and renown. In a Wikipedia entry devoted to him, Pekar is quoted as saying that American Splendor is "an autobiography written as it's happening. The theme is about staying alive. Getting a job, finding a mate, having a place to live, finding a creative outlet." One imagines he died more contented and fulfilled for having made a genuine mark upon the world.

Yiddishkeit, the book, is a graphic celebration of Yiddish culture that includes several major pieces by Pekar in collaboration with his talented artists. We learn that his first language was Yiddish and that, as an adult, he developed advanced tastes in Yiddish literature.

However, although finely illustrated by Dan Archer, his two pieces recounting the history of classic and modern Yiddish lit are uneven, wordy and idiosyncratic. Appearing as himself in the cartoon, Pekar complains at one point that Isaac Bashevis Singer is "so overrated it makes me sick. James Joyce never got a Nobel Prize but I.B. Singer did. Wonderful – maybe next year Harold Robbins'll get it." The anthology is also saddled with a 42-page script called The Essence, A Yiddish Theatre Dim Sum that, whatever its virtues on the stage, pales to blandness on the page.

These failings aside, there are many gems here. The series of page-long cartoons by Joel Schechter and drawn by Manuel (Spain) Rodriguez are particularly fine in the way they dramatize pivotal and legendary moments in Yiddishkeit. Robeson Sings Yiddish chronicles the great American singer's visit to Moscow in 1949 where he performed a concert in Yiddish. During his historic trip, Robeson asked the Soviet authorities if he might see his two Jewish friends, and was told one was on holiday and the other had died in an automobile accident. In truth, one had been imprisoned and the other murdered by the KGB.

Chayale Ash's Day in Court, also by Schechter and Spain, presents the tale of the Romanian actress and troupe who were arrested in Haifa in 1948 for performing in Yiddish because the government "was afraid Yiddish would overtake Hebrew, the national language." Ash and troupe countersued, emerged victorious and resumed their performances. Mark Twain Translated, another Schechter-Spain cartoon, dramatizes the memorable meeting of Sholem Aleichem and Mark Twain – the one being "the Jewish Mark Twain" and the other "the American Sholem Aleichem."

In the editor's introduction to a three-page graphic depiction of Yip Harburg's Depression-era song Brother Can You Spare a Dime?, we learn something new about the left-leaning lyricist whose greatest contribution to popular culture may have been the lyrics in The Wizard of Oz. Evidently the word "rainbow" did not "exist in the literary original of The Wizard of Oz by L. Frank Baum. It was Harburg's key addition and, right-wing critics accurately charged, implied an idyllic socialism."

Several pieces are pleasantly drenched in nostalgia for the Yiddish New York of a century ago, from Rivington Street to Second Avenue. Coney Island, Nathaniel Buchwald's lively and flavourful Yiddish essay from 1926 (translated by Hershl Hartman), wonderfully conveys the sights, sounds and smells of that crowded beach paradise, while Peter Kuper's fine illustration perfectly captures its essence. And a fascinating set of cartoons from the old American Yiddish satirical journal Der Groyser Kundes (The Big Stick) seems to convey a world of information about the vanished milieu of the Yiddish theatre.

There are odes to the cinema here, too. Abraham Lincoln Polonsky, a piece about the American screenwriter of Body and Soul and Force of Evil (script by Dave Wagner, Paul Buhle, Peter Kuper; art by Kuper), is a stark and lovely depiction of the accomplished film-noir genius. An overly long depiction (12 pages) of Edgar G. Ulmer's 1937 film Green Fields, as retold and drawn by Sharon Rudahl, at least provides the occasion for the editors to recall Ulmer's worthy contributions to American cinema.

Although not particularly dramatically rendered, a three-page cartoon about Aaron Lansky, founder of the National Yiddish Book Center, rightfully attempts to canonize him in the pantheon of Yiddish underdogs and heroes that this book seeks to immortalize.

A peculiar mixture for sure, and some of it questionable, but there is still plenty to satisfy in this odd grab bag of Yiddishkeit.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

WRITERS MICHAEL CHABON, HOWARD JACOBSON TO READ AT HARBOURFRONT

Michael Chabon and Howard Jacobson are among the impressive roster of writers due to participate in the 33rd annual International Festival of Authors at Toronto's Harbourfront from Oct. 18 to 28.

Chabon's works include The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier & Clay (2000) and The Yiddish Policemen's Union (2007), while Jacobson wrote the Man Booker Prize-winning The Finkler Question (2010). War of 1812: Two hundred years ago this week, the United States declared war on Britain and its colonies in Canada. Yap Films has produced Explosion 1812, a two-hour documentary about the American attack on Toronto (then called York), preceding which the British blew up their own munitions, resulting in a huge blast that rattled windows 50 kilometres away. "It was the largest explosion that had ever been witnessed in North America and the pivotal moment of the entire war," said executive producer Elliott Halpern. The film aired this week on History Television and is being rebroadcast on Canada Day, July 1.

Literary Buzz: David Bezmozgis, who won a Canadian Jewish Book Award this month for his 2011 novel The Free World, told Eye On Arts at the awards ceremony that he is working on another novel. The story is set in the Crimea in the modern era and extends to Israel and Ukraine. However, unlike The Free World, it has no Canadian connection or characters.

Bezmozgis is also working on a feature film adaptation for Natasha, the title piece in his acclaimed story anthology of 2004. "If everything works out, it will be filming here next summer and I will direct it," he said. The Toronto-based author and director (whose 2008 film, Victoria Day, is a competent and impressive piece of work) also reminisced about his first time in print. His first published story, he said, was a travel piece on the International Boxing Hall of Fame in Canastota, N.Y., which ran in The CJN about 1997.

Musical Buzz: Reports have reached us that there were some sour notes during a recent concert by Galilean-born Arab Simon Shaheen at the Royal Conservatory of Music's Koerner Hall. Oh, the music was all right, but in conversation Shaheen, who graduated from the Academy of Music in Jerusalem in 1978, so assiduously avoided uttering the word "Israel" that people got upset. Shaheen referred to Haifa and the Galilee as being part of Palestine and the RCM interviewer politely played along. Isn't it about time for Palestinian nationalists to face the music that Israel really exists?

Neil Diamond to play several Canadian cities

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Neil Diamond could easily settle into retirement and look back at his nearly 50-year recording career during which he's sold 125 million records and had 39 Top 40 hits.

But Diamond is not ready to get out of the spotlight yet. He is currently on a 31-city North American concert tour that includes Canadian stops in Montreal, Toronto, London and Vancouver.

He has much to beam about, especially about events in his life over the past two years. Diamond recently married for the third time, to his 41-year-old manager, Katie McNeil. He was inducted into the Rock And Roll Hall of Fame in 2011 and ended that year as a Kennedy Center honoree for lifetime achievement in the performing arts.

"I feel so fortunate to make my dream a lifetime's work. Having Katie with me, being honoured over the past two years – I am as excited about singing and songwriting now as I ever was. I feel that I have been rejuvenated. I'm looking forward to another 20 years of singing and songwriting," said Diamond in a phone interview from his home in Los Angeles.

He has sold more records in his career than most artists half his age, yet seems to be humble enough to avoid the excesses of stardom. Diamond's last two CDs, Twelve Songs (2005) and Home Before Dark (2008), gave him the status of being the oldest artist to reach No. 1 on the Billboard music charts.

Opening his tour in Fort Lauderdale on June 1, Diamond sang 29 songs in a two-hour concert without either an opening act or intermission. Dressed in a black shirt and black pants, he performed his most beloved songs from the past five decades, ranging from his first hit Cherry, Cheery (1966) to Hell Yeah (2005) with his 14-piece band.

Most memorable for Diamond fans were his singing his signature tunes, America; I Am I Said; I'm a Believer and Sweet Caroline, which fans sang along with him.

"I am grateful that after all these years, people resonate with my songs. I try to be honest and truthful in everything I do – just the same as when I was struggling in the 1960s. But for me, it is not the fame or money that moves me – it is the challenge of expressing myself in new songs."

Neil Diamond

Diamond recreated, to a degree, his Jewish upbringing when he starred in the film The Jazz Singer, a remake of the tale of a cantor who found fame as a pop singer.

"Even though my parents wanted me to become a doctor and not a cantor, the film is a tribute to my Jewish heritage.

Israeli soldiers face Palestinian demonstrators in Bil'in, which is cut off from its olive groves by Israel's security barrier.

Since 2005, the Palestinian village of Bil'in, a bedroom suburb of Ramallah four kilometres east of the old Green Line, has been the venue of weekly demonstrations to protest the construction of Israel's security barrier, much of which cuts into the West Bank and physically divides Arab communities.

The villagers, mostly farmers who tend mature olive tree groves, oppose the fence because it separates them from nearly two-thirds of their agricultural fields and signals an intention by Israel to seize yet more of their lands.

Typically, the residents, backed by Israeli and international peace activists, have marched to the barrier to disrupt work on it, prompting intervention by the Israeli army. In these clashes, two Palestinians have been killed and many more have been injured.

Emad Burnat, a Palestinian born in Bil'in, has been recording these events with video cameras for the past seven years. Drawing on more than 700 hours of this footage, he and Israeli filmmaker Guy Davidi have produced a jolting 90-minute documentary, 5 Broken Cameras, which opens June 22 at the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema in Toronto.

The title is a reference to the number of Burnat's cameras that have been rendered inoperable by violence as he has documented these developments.

Burnat bought his first video camera to film his new-born son, Jibril, but after Bil'in was divided by the route of the barrier, he began focusing on the troubles that the barrier brought to the village.

Being a highly personal and subjective film, 5 Broken Cameras addresses the issue from a purely Palestinian perspective, concentrating on the confrontations that have pitted the villagers against Israeli troops, on the one hand, and the bitter verbal exchanges that have erupted between Palestinians and Jewish settlers, on the other.

Beyond these ugly outbursts, it deals with the role that Israel's Supreme Court has played in this ongoing struggle and conveys the Palestinians' deep attachment to their land.

No mention is made of the fact that Israel's decision to build the barrier was directly motivated by a spate of Palestinian suicide bombings from 2001 onwards that virtually traumatized Israel.

And although Bil'in is widely regarded as a model of non-violent Palestinian resistance to the barrier, which has been deemed illegal by the International Court of Justice, 5 Broken Cameras all but ignores Palestinian stone-throwing incidents that have injured Israeli soldiers.

Although the film does not dwell on the complexities of the Arab-Israeli dispute and therefore lacks evenhandedness, it underscores the bitterness that lies at the core of this enduring and seemingly intractable conflict.

Singer embraces Judaism

"I worked very hard to retell this classic story of a Jewish cantor who left his expected place in society for a world in show business," he said. "I loved the retelling of the Jewish experience. So much of the story reminds me of my grandparents and their kind of life. They were immigrants to America and taught Yiddish to me as a child.

"I wanted Yiddish in this movie. In fact, I tried to convince the director at one point to have the whole opening in Yiddish with subtitles, as they did in The Godfather. Yiddish is a beautiful language, and I wanted to do my part to keep it alive," added Diamond, whose first language at home was Yiddish, taught to him by his grandmother.

Born in Brooklyn in 1941 to Akeeba and Rose Diamond, young Neil knew he wanted a career in music, but to satisfy his father's wishes for a stable career, he enrolled as a pre-medicine student at New York University.

After taking his first job as a songwriter for $50 weekly in 1961, Diamond was hooked on a music career ever since.

Although he has some disdain for organized religion, he wants to embrace Jewishness and raises funds for organizations he admires.

"I am Jewish. I believe in God, love the traditions I learned growing up, and tend to be very spiritual, so I want to pass on to my four grandchildren all I know about their heritage," he said.

Following the end of the concert tour in September, Diamond will be going on a six-month honeymoon to New York, Israel and Italy, among other destinations.

"I want Katie to know everything about me and my past. Aside from my natural ties to New York City and Israel, my mother has relatives in Italy, so we look forward to a wonderful journey together," he said.

Maccabi hockey tryout attracts talented players

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When 22 Canadian skaters take to the ice in Metulla next summer to compete in the Maccabiah Games, they'll be wearing official Team Canada sweaters – the same uniforms worn by Canadian teams at the Olympic Games and World Championships.

Hockey Canada has given Maccabi Canada the green light to use the jerseys, along with other hockey apparel, said Alex Voihanski, manager of Maccabi's Team Canada. It's a testament to the stature possessed by the Maccabiah Games and signals to players that the event is held in high esteem, he said.

Judging from the quality of the competition at tryouts last week, Team Canada should have plenty of good players to justify using Team Canada uniforms.

About 50 skaters took part in scrimmages at the Pavilion sports complex north of Toronto. Among them were professionals or NHL draftees; NCAA Division I and III players, plus junior and major junior players. They auditioned in front of a battery of Maccabi coaches, headed by former NHL bench boss Mike Keenan.

The coaching staff, which includes OHL coaches Greg Gilbert (Saginaw) and Mike Polino (Peterborough), was suitably impressed, said Voihanski. There's an embarrassment of riches in the Jewish community when it comes to high-end hockey talent, he said.

In addition to the players vying for a spot on the "open" team, another 90 or so tried out for the under-19 squad. Mario Cicchillo, head coach of the Toronto Junior Canadiens and coach of the under-19 team, said a lot of AAA to A calibre players were on hand. Two weeks before, at tryouts in Montreal, 27 kids showed up; 11 skaters and three goalies made the cut to the second round of tryouts.

"Quite a few could play on the Junior Canadiens. I think we've got a pretty good crop here in Toronto," said Cicchillo, who served as head coach of Team Ontario at the World Under 17 Hockey Challenge in 2009.

Junior hockey will be making its debut at the Maccabiah Games in 2013, though the "open" version has already been a medal sport at the Games. In 1997 Canada won a gold medal in the sport. The Canadian team was loaded with quality players, led by AHL skater Harold Hersh, the brother team of Mikhail and David Nemirovsky (David played for a time with Florida Panthers before ending his career in the KHL), ex-NHLer Brian Wilks and bolstered by youngsters (and future NHL draftees) Michael Henrich and Cory Pecker.

As in 1997, the United States is expected to provide Canada with the stiffest competition. Israel and France round out the competition.

Judging from the quality of players at the tryout, the Canadians should be good starting from the goal out. Among a talented group of netminders, Daniel Altshuller possesses the most impressive hockey resume. Altshuller plays for the Oshawa Generals of the OHL and is rated by NHL Central Scouting 12th among North American goalies heading into the 2012 entry draft.

Playing for the Nepean Raiders in the tier two Central Canadian Hockey League in 2011, he was selected to the OHL-dominated Team Ontario and backstopped the squad to a gold medal in the World Under-17 Tournament. Later, he was Canada's number one goalie at the Ivan Hlinka Memorial Under-18 Tournament, where he won another gold medal and was named player of the game in the final game.

Others vying for goaltending duties include Cody Rosen, a New York Islanders draft pick who plays for Clarkson University in the NCAA, and Kevin Kliman, who played for Brown University. Two other prospects who could not attend the camp include Mark Segal, a goalie with Vancouver Giants of the Western Hockey League from 2009 to 2011, and Josh Tordjman, who played two games for the Phoenix Coyotes during a four-year AHL career. He now backstops EC Red Bull Salzburg in the Austrian Hockey League.

Up front, brothers Michael and Adam Henrich stood out at the tryouts with their size, skating and skill. Michael was a first-round pick, 13th overall, by the Edmonton Oilers in 1998 – the highest ever for any Jewish player – while Adam was selected 60th overall by Tampa Bay in 2002. They play in the Italian pro league and two years ago were on the same team and led the Asiago Lions to a championship.

Zach Hyman, drafted by the Florida Panthers in the fifth round in 2010, played for the University of Michigan this past season. Zach Sternberg, a defenceman with Lake Superior State of the NCAA stood, out as did Andrew Calof, a centre for Princeton University.

Dylan Smoskowitz, who played the last two years with the Barrie Colts and Benjamin Rubin, who played for Patrick Roy's Quebec Remparts in 2006-07 and in France this past season, were also impressive, Voihanski said.

"Rubin had an excellent camp," he said. "Playing in Europe has done wonders for him… He has NHL-calibre skating."

A number of players who were unable to attend the tryouts are still in the running for the final roster, Voihanski said. Among there are Winnipegger Jacob Micflikier, who plays for the AHL Hershey Bears; Vancouver native Trevor Smith, second leading scorer on the Calder Cup champion Norfolk Admirals; Barrie Colt Daniel Erlich, and Ethan Werek, a 2009 second-round pick of the New York Rangers who played last season with the Portland Pirates of the AHL.

Voihanski said he plans to reach out to Calgary Flame Mike Cammalleri, but believes injury concerns and prohibitive insurance costs make the participation of NHL players unlikely.

Still, no one has yet turned down his offer to participate in the tournament.

"We've gotten very enthusiastic responses from the players. A lot of guys were into the fact it's a real Maccabiah tournament where you walk into a stadium in front of thousands or people," he said.

Players are also impressed with the quality of coaching. "They'll be playing for a staff they've never played for thewir entire lives. Between the coaching staff, the opportunity to represent Canada and [the fact] it's the Maccabiah Games, the response was tremendous," he said.

At the rink, the enthusiasm was apparent. Matt Silcoff, 19, took part in the World Cup of Jewish Hockey in Metulla three years ago. A left winger who'll attend Middlebury Collegiate, a Division III school in Vermont next fall, he said that "it's a good level of hockey. There are a lot of good players here fighting for a few spots."

Adam Henrich said he was excited to hear hockey was returning to the Maccabiah Games. "It's a pretty big tournament, and it's an honour to play for your country, your religion," he said.

Henrich spent 10 days in Israel on a personal trip two years ago and hopes to return on the same team with his brother. "Ideally, that's what we're here for," he said.

Dustin Laren, 22, played for Canada at the World Cup of Jewish Hockey. "It was one of the most fun trips of my entire life. Everyone's so close, you're in Israel and you have the chance to represent Canada as a hockey player. It's unbelievable," he said.

Unfortunately, not all the prospects will make the final 22-man roster or five-man reserve unit. Fourteen guys were thanked for their efforts after the first day of scrimmage and didn't return for the second.

That still leaves a core of about 35 players whom the team's management will monitor over the next few months. The deadline for submitting a roster for the Games is May 31, 2013, and a decision on the Canadian team won't be made until next winter – sort of like Hockey Canada's timetable for the Olympic Games, Voihanski said.

Seeking the fate of three missing soldiers 30 years later

Hillel Kuttler
JTA

JERUSALEM — Soon after the war in Lebanon began in June 1982, Avigdor Chen's tank unit fell into a trap. Artillery rained from high ground occupied by the Syrians near the village of Sultan Yacoub. The battle continued all night.

When dawn broke, Chen saw a struck Israeli tank some 100 yards away. With smoke billowing from it, the tank rolled downhill. Chen ran toward the now-stopped tank. He smelled burning human flesh and looked inside. The commander, Zohar Lipschitz, was dead. Chen ventured no further into the tank, knowing that another shell could follow imminently. Chen later learned that Yehuda Katz was also inside the tank.

Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman and Yehuda Katz

Katz, then 25; Zachary Baumel, 21, with whom Chen had been friends since basic training; and a third soldier, Zvi Feldman, 22, have been missing ever since that battle, which took place 30 years ago, on June 11. Not a single letter, photograph, video clip or third-party message from them has reached the outside world, nor has any proof of their deaths emerged.

"I really feel strongly that there may be a chance that some of these guys are still alive and that there's still hope," Chen said. "People in Vietnam went missing for so many years and they turned up."

But, he added, "they're on the radar much less than they used to be. There's not even a blurb about them."

With Gilad Schalit's release last October from more than five years in Hamas captivity in Gaza, Israeli MiAs fell from public consciousness. Long before Schalit's release, Baumel, Katz and Feldman were all but forgotten, unreported in negotiations over prisoner exchanges. No leftover, Schalit-era demonstrations are being recycled or protest tents filled to demand the trio's freedom or proof of their fate.

The Israeli media recently began marking the Lebanon War's 30th anniversary. In one radio interview, a brigade commander mentioned the missing trio in passing – but not by name.

The silence is striking for a country that values memory so highly and takes such pride in its soldiers. Within days of the 2006 seizing of Schalit by Hamas and the kidnapping of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev by Hezbollah, posters and placards proclaiming: "Return Our Sons to Their Borders" adorned Israel's lampposts. Two summers later, the country fairly stopped in its tracks to watch television coverage of the bodies of Goldwasser and Regev being repatriated at the Rosh Hanikra border crossing in a prisoner swap.

The longer Schalit remained in captivity, the more intense became the public relations campaign by Israelis to press Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to secure his release.

Meanwhile, Ron Arad, held prisoner since bailing out from his shot-down combat fighter over Lebanon in 1986, remains a household name.

"That was a bit telling: that people didn't put these three soldiers in the same place they put Ron Arad, Schalit and [Goldwasser and Regev]," Arieh O'Sullivan, a veteran writer on Israeli military affairs, remarked about the radio interview. "These three never had a public outcry to get them back because the military never had a public outcry to get them back."

"They've been forgotten," said Efraim Inbar, director of Bar-Ilan University's Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies. "They disappeared, as if the ground swallowed them up."

Explanations abound for the societal distinctions: the public presumed the three soldiers dead almost from their moment of capture; the 2009 death of Baumel's father, Yona, sapped the movement of its most vocal advocate; the three MiAs were single, while Arad's wife and baby daughter lent powerful poignancy to everyone's nightmare of a soldier disappearing; people and their causes move on.

> 'They've been forgotten'

The Israel Defence Forces officially classifies Baumel, Feldman and Katz as "missing." The soldiers' parents have fought periodic IDF initiatives to declare the men dead without producing proof of their fate. Thirty years later, Baumel's mother, Miriam, retains hope.

She and her late husband tirelessly knocked on every door to obtain Zachary Baumel's freedom. They met Israeli government leaders, IDF brass, foreign officials, Red Cross representatives, Diaspora Jewish community members, journalists – anyone who might help obtain proof of their son's fate. They lobbied the U.S. Congress to pass legislation that then-president Bill Clinton signed into law in 1999, calling on the State Department to press Arab governments to provide information on the three Israeli MiAs.

Later this month, Miriam Baumel will travel to England to seek out a British diplomat who reportedly witnessed the parading of three kidnapped Israeli soldiers – perhaps her son, Katz and Feldman – through Damascus streets just hours after their capture. She will address Jewish audiences in London and Manchester to rally support.

Advocate fights for Israel despite 'tough environment'

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

For the past three years, Joshua Goodman has called Brussels his home, but he's hardly ever there for long. His love of Israel advocacy has him hopping all over Europe.

"Right now, I have two suitcases, small and large, that permanently stay at the foot of my bed," says Goodman, who is always ready for an impromptu trip.

The 31-year-old Toronto native is the communications director for the American Jewish Committee. His job is to advocate for Jewish issues all over the continent. One day, he might be in England, the next in Austria and then in France.

"From the looks of it, I will only be in Brussels maybe one or two weekends until the end of August," he says. "Not that I'm complaining."

Goodman started out at York University's Schulich School of Business, but decided after a few weeks that he wanted a more worldly education. He moved to the history department, which he calls the best decision he's ever made.

His interest in the Middle East grew during his undergraduate studies, leading him to a master's degree in Middle Eastern history at Tel Aviv University.

"It was a wonderful experience to live in Israel," he says, describing it as an eye-opener into the issues Israelis face on a daily basis. "Whenever you heard a loud bang, your first thought was always negative."

"Too often the news was terrible," he says. "It was a sobering reality, whatever your opinions were. This was average life in Israel."

Inspired by his experiences, he began a career in Israel advocacy that brought him first to Washington, D.C., and then to Brussels.

Although he loves living in Brussels, he says life there can be difficult because of the widespread anti-Israel attitude.

"There's so much focus on the mistakes Israel is making in the peace process and not so much on the Palestinian role," he says. "A lot of the legitimately good friends of Israel are critical."

The AJC Brussels office is one of five in Europe. As part of its advocacy, it also runs a radio show about international politics on the local Radio Judaica.

A large portion of Goodman's work involves meeting with people who are anti-Israel and building bridges with those who have opposing views, such as foreign ministers from the Arab world, he says.

His trick in discussions with people who disagree with him is to focus on portions of the arguments that can be won.

"You're not going to win the argument that settlements are legal, but you can perhaps persuade them that settlements are not the core issue and are not the reason there isn't peace right now."

Usually, his Judaism isn't an issue, he says, but he has noticed some fear among other Jewish people living in Belgium.

He recalls one surprising situation when he was visiting a Jewish school. The weather was stunning and he could hear birds chirping happily, when suddenly he was approached by armed police officers questioning his reason for visiting to the school, trying to ensure the safety of the children.

"It's almost like this enclave of happiness was surrounded by fear," he says.

Israel advocacy runs in Goodman's family. Both his parents, Sheldon and Lindy Goodman, are involved in the Jewish community, holding positions with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, among other organizations.

"They can't blame me for choosing the career path I did," he says, adding that it can be quite difficult to live so far away from his family, but he loves his new home.

"In a way, I was returning back to where my family came from," he says, referring to his mother's roots in Antwerp, Belgium.

"It's where my family left partly because of negative circumstances," he says. "It's nice to come back and rebuild Jewish life here."

Despite the challenges that come with working in sometimes hostile situations, he says he loves fighting to promote Israel and Jewish issues, and has no immediate plans to return home.

Ultimately, he says the work is worthwhile and important to Jewish communities all over the world.

"You always have to be up to date and on your toes to find out how you can influence the decision-making process," he says.

"It's a tough environment to work in, but that's what drives me."

We last left a mythical board of a synagogue/school with a question: "Would changing lights in the building result in a real 78 per cent cost savings?"

Readers posted comments on The CJN website, including a City of Toronto representative and a lighting company (http://bit.ly/cjntsj19-comments).

However, the most interesting observations, unrecorded on the website, came from a team of middle school junior energy auditors from the Toronto Montessori Jewish Day School, where learning is facilitated through self-discovery, using guided conversations and experiments.

The conversation started with a video that looked at the science behind climate change and ways to reduce energy generation requirements by changing consumption habits (http://bit.ly/climatereality-billnye).

The students, who were split into junior energy auditor teams, developed an understanding of their own family's consumption patterns, with each team contributing data on the number of family members at home and the size of the home. They also pulled data from their family's electricity and gas bills.

The teams then compiled a table of monthly consumption numbers, sharing the information they had. By putting numbers side by side, the students saw patterns emerge, and this prompted a discussion about kilowatt hours and consumption.

Why do two same-sized houses with an equal number of occupants have different consumption patterns? Did this apply to schools and synagogues, too?

In the home discussion, big-screen TVs, refrigerators, washer/dryers, dishwashers, microwaves and electronic chargers were identified as devices that consume electricity. The light bulb discussion led to an expedition to the school building and the synagogue that houses it. The students counted the number of fluorescent lights that consumed electricity in two portable classrooms. Moving to the main synagogue building, they were confronted with multiple lighting types and many incandescent, compact fluorescent lamps (CFLs), warm lights, cool lights, spotlights and chandelier bulbs. They asked how long the lights were left on, how long the bulbs would last, how long it takes to change a bulb and the effects of esthetics due to different light colours. Back in the classroom, the students started to put it together: how much lighting was there in the school versus the synagogue, how long were the lights left on and how does that build up to kilowatt hours, and how is the school charged for energy consumption within its monthly rent?

However, unlike at home, there was no utility bill the junior energy auditors could look at to see the total kilowatt hours consumed.

Without that bill, the students concluded there was no incentive or monetary value for the school to conserve energy, as there was no way to quantify the impact. They did see the value of conserving energy at home where behaviour changes could be tracked to quantified consumption reductions.

The Montessori learning method helped students experience first-hand a systemic Jewish community issue, the non-transparency of energy data. Would making consumption data visible to a tenant/school, leading to reduced consumption/operating costs, be a disadvantage to a landlord/synagogue by leading to reduced revenues?

Transparency needed? Discuss!

DEEP-DISH CHOCOLATE CHIP CARAMEL TOFFEE COOKIES

|---|---|
| 4 c flour | 2 lg eggs |
| 1 tsp baking powder | 1 tblsp vanilla |
| 1 tsp baking soda | 1 c semi-sweet chocolate chips |
| 3 sticks butter, softened | 1 c caramel bits |
| 1 c white sugar | 1/2 c toffee bits |
| 1 c brown sugar | |

Preheat oven to 375°. Coat small ramekin type baking dishes with non-stick cooking spray. In medium bowl, combine flour, baking powder, baking soda. In mixer beat butter, white sugar, brown sugar until creamy; beat in eggs and vanilla. Gradually add in flour mixture. Stir in chocolate chips, caramel, and toffee. Scoop 1/3 c cookie dough in each ramekin. Place ramekins on cookie sheet; bake 20-25 min. or until golden brown, but still soft. Cool on wire rack 5-10 min. before serving. Top with ice cream and extra toffee bits if desired.

Consider the message of chalk art

Life is all right there – with all its nuances – so, when I see them, I jot them down in a BlackBerry file called "ideas." There they are ready to use. They are available. Here are some moments, interactions, I was witness to or part of. You can define them any way you like.

• I was talking to some litigation lawyers at Ve'ahavta. I thanked them for their volunteer work. They told me that, in the course of the day, their clients rarely thank them. Do we think we don't have to thank them because of their hefty hourly rates? But is that sound reasoning? Shouldn't we thank them for their caring? My family lawyer cared.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

• I've discovered there are a number of different ways to spell the Almighty's name. I was reading a newspaper, and to my surprise, there was the word "Gawd." I'm familiar with G-d spelled by those who believe that the Omnipotent's name is not to be tossed out with the rest of the paper. I know the word God, which is for those who likely put less stock in His written name. But "Gawd"? It seems somewhat redneck, the way "gosh" or "golly" would be. It's quite something that we are so meticulous about the Almighty's written name. Why? Do we who believe in God believe so much?

• A man I know was booted out of his home. One of my staff, Theresa Schrader, invited him to her house. He took her up on it. Theresa didn't have an extra bed, so he slept in her five-year-old son's bed. I asked many people if they would do the same thing, or at least free up their child's bed for a guest to sleep in. I have often met non-Jews who are tenacious in their practice of good deeds, yet make very little fuss about them. Perhaps having the Torah naturally makes us louder about our goodness, like the kid who got all the answers right on her test. Is that true? Would you ask or tell your child to sleep on the couch for a guest?

• Now here's an interesting one that naturally follows from the previous story. I've learned that there are many children who become very close with a neighbour, particularly those children who feel somewhat neglected at home. It's as if they are adopting a parent or have found a parent figure in the woman or man down the street. One of my dear friends who grew up frum and somewhat impoverished told me about his neighbour who took a liking to him, introduced him to airplane models and took him to events around the city.

I know a man who, when he was a child, became like a son to the guy next store because he didn't have a father and was invited to all their family celebrations. How wonderful, I thought, that people would extend themselves like that and feel such compassion for the kid down the block. Have you "parented" a child who you sensed needed it?

Throughout the day when you are excited about your own quote, write it down. If someone else's words move you, do the same. Watch your surroundings. Consider the course of the floating leaf or the message of the sidewalk chalk art. Life is a series of nuances all laid out in front of us to figure out. Or they are not.

Tribute to Israel

'To better the world'

Like most countries, Israel is full of people. And like most people, Israel's are all colours, all sizes, all manner of reprobates, saints, ordinary folk and many who rise above the fray. And, like people everywhere, they are all works in progress

Indeed Israel itself, born a scant 64 years ago, is a work in progress.

In the early 1970s, it was still a Third World country. Today, less than four decades later, it is among the main drivers throughout the world of advancements in every applied field of science and technology. Hardly a day passes without a new innovation or advancement announced involving Israelis in areas of the environment, medicine, biology, electronics, engineering, agriculture, information and high technology.

Just last week, for example, it was reported in the scientific journal Molecular Neurodegeneration that researchers from the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology faculty of medicine identified a biomarker comprising five genes that can predict Parkinson's disease with high accuracy. The discovery has enormous implications in the treatment of the disease, perhaps in delaying its onset, and perhaps even one day in its prevention. The only way to diagnose the disease currently is to observe the symptoms only after they appear in the patient.

Or, as reported on the website Times of Israel also last week, an Israeli scientist, Daniel Hillel, has been awarded the World Food Prize. The prize, created by Norman Borlaug, the winner of the 1970 Nobel Peace Prize, honours those who fight against global hunger. Hillel won for a micro-irrigation system he developed. Hillel's system carries water through narrow plastic pipes to plants, where it drips or trickles on to the roots. He has revolutionized agricultural practices around the world by enabling food to be grown in some of the harshest, driest climates on Earth while conserving scarce, precious water. Hillel has brought life-saving technology to dozens of countries in the Middle East, Africa, Asia and South America. Apparently, people from Egypt, Jordan and the United Arab Emirates supported Hillel's nomination for the award.

These are just two recent announcements of Israeli innovation. There are countless.

The reason we call readers' attention to them, however, is to point out and emphasize why they came about. What was the motivation that led to the research, the labour, the findings, the inventions in the first place?

Editorial

The Israelis are members of IsraAID, an umbrella organization of Jewish and Israeli relief groups that travel the world to provide aid wherever such aid is needed. These rapid deployment Israeli response teams work in conjunction with Jewish communities in the Diaspora, including, significantly, the Jews of Canada. (See the related story on page 6.) They rushed to Japan in the wake of the horrific earthquake and tsunami that struck the island in March 2011 to help its people cope with the monstrous disaster, to help them heal and become whole once again.

IsraAID's founder, Shachar Zahavi, explains that the raison d'être of the group is to help the needy. The group's "innovative response teams have brought a whole new dimension to the world of development work and to the concept of tikkun olam." And, he says without fanfare or self-congratulation, "We must continue our efforts to better the world."

"To better the world" is the very essence and core and heart of the purpose of the existence of the people called Jews and of their sovereign state, called Israel.

Israel is a tiny, imperfect little country obsessively vilified, falsely accused and vituperatively scorned by its enemies and by so many others who wish to see it disappear. And yet, its people, without hesitation or doubt, turn toward humanity, face forward, inclining fully to the challenge and the responsibility to help where help is needed, "to better the world."

And that is why we offer these pages of tribute to Israel. Tribute is well deserved. And we are proud to say so.

Ethiopian-born Israeli champions higher education

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c.com

Pnina Gaday Agenyahu does not remember trekking for two weeks with her mother and elder sister from Ethiopia across the desert of Sudan. She was only three years old when they arrived at a refugee camp waiting to be brought to the home they'd never seen – Israel.

Agenyahu, now 30, was recently appointed as the first Ethiopian-born member of Israel's Council for Higher Education. And as Hillel director at Tel Aviv University since August 2007, she is also the world's only Ethiopian-born director among more than 500 campus clubs run by Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

At a time when Israel is examining its successes and failures in absorbing Ethiopian Jews who began arriving in the early 1980s – their numbers today reach about 130,000 – Agenyahu's achievements are all the more exceptional.

She says she owes much to her mother's decision to move to Haifa after two years in an absorption centre in northern Israel.

"We were the only Ethiopian family in our neighbourhood," Agenyahu says. "On the one hand, it's a privilege to live among a wider family and we missed that support, but on the other hand, my mom understood that here she would be able to raise her kids with more opportunities. It was more challenging to be on our own, and it was lonely, but it also required us to be like the Israelis around us."

Her mother and stepfather could not help with schoolwork as her classmates' parents could. "I had to accept that, but I did not have to accept that this would happen to my own kids. It will be different," pledges the newlywed, who lives in Yehud, near Tel Aviv.

She came to fully appreciate the positive effects of her mother's choice during her second year in an army educational unit. Living in an Ethiopian Jewish neighbourhood of Rehovot, she taught teens leadership skills and helped dropouts get back into school.

"That was the first time I saw that not everyone had grown up like me," she says. "They had much bigger challenges, and many of them had turned to drugs and alcohol. At 19, seeing that broke my heart, and I understood that in my life I wanted to be not only a role model; I wanted to see what I could do to help. Every year, I find a way to volunteer in the community no matter what else I am doing."

Pnina Gaday Agenyahu

From Agenyahu's perspective, success hinges on being aware of opportunities and taking advantage of them. "I see that young [Ethiopian] people today are not always aware of the opportunities in their lives. It's hard to define the doors open to you when you are so focused on your poverty and helping your family."

Her mother worked in a kindergarten and cleaned houses until severe asthma disabled her. Her older sister helped support the family from the age of 12. "In Ethiopia, education was only for those who could be spared from supporting the family. Usually only one of the children could go to school, and in my family that was me. My mom and her new husband pushed me to earn a higher education." Later they sent her younger half-sister and half-brother to college as well.

Agenyahu opted to board at a private girls' high school in Jerusalem. "The quality of education was better than at the public school in Haifa, and they had lots of afterschool programs I wouldn't have had at home because my mom would not have had money for them," she explains.

After the army, she enrolled at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where she was disappointed to find few classes and activities relating to Ethiopian Jewry.

"I read everything I could, and almost every assignment I got I connected to my community," Agenyahu says. "At the campus Hillel House, they had Yiddish classes and clubs for English-speakers and Russian-speakers, but nothing for Ethiopians. So I asked the director if we could plan something celebrating the culture of Ethiopian Jewry, and he said I'd need to raise the money for it."

To her surprise, the event attracted not only funding but also about 300 participants. Later, she co-ordinated cross-cultural initiatives such as a Yemenite evening and an Italian-Jewish event, and eventually became Hillel's program director.

After graduating, she taught Zionism and Jewish identity in overseas Jewish communities on behalf of the Jewish Agency. Her near-perfect English is a result of two summers at Camp Ramah in Chicago, and a few months in Australia and England from 2005 to 2006.

Despite her full-time job, Agenyahu is often asked by world Jewish federations to come share her personal story, report on the status of Israel's Ethiopians and explain the need for developing Jewish identity on an Israeli college campus.

"It's not so obvious why we have Hillel groups in Israel," she says. "Judaism in Israel is taken for granted, but most of Jewish life is kept by one 'side,' the Orthodox, while the other 'side' chooses to be more Israeli than Jewish. I always tell people that you can take responsibility for your Jewish identity without being religious."

The programs she began at TAU stress community volunteering with youth at risk, Holocaust survivors, Darfur refugees and children of parents struggling with illness. She gives study sessions connecting this work with fundamental Jewish values. And she facilitates student dialogues between native Israelis, new immigrants and short-term visitors from abroad.

Agenyahu fit the bill when Education Minister Gideon Saar was seeking qualified women and Ethiopians to serve on the Council for Higher Education. This body sets policies and grants accreditation at Israel's 200-plus institutions of higher education.

"The Education Ministry is making efforts in improving education among Ethiopians," she says. "Today there are many questions about the future of our country and how higher education makes for a more equitable society."

Israeli named Europe's top young researcher

Meredith Mandell
JTA

She's young, smart and aims to help treat life-threatening diseases.

Naama Geva-Zatorsky, 34, is leading the way for Israeli women scientists to gain recognition for their contributions to scientific research.

The Weizmann Institute biologist was in Paris in March to accept the International UNESCO L'Oreal Prize for Women in Science. Dubbed "Europe's top young researcher" by the prize committee, she received a two-year, $40,000 fellowship for her postdoctoral work at Harvard University.

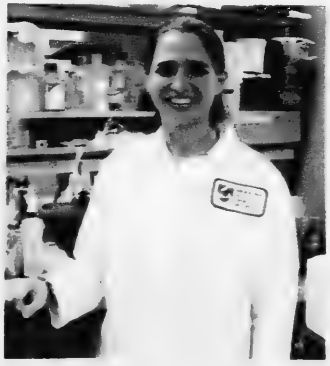
Geva-Zatorsky's research focuses on probiotics, which are commonly known as "good bacteria" and have the potential to treat a variety of diseases.

Geva-Zatorsky, who holds a master's degree and a doctorate in systems biology, believes there is room for more research on the potential benefits of probiotics.

Her lab work has focused on the "good" microbes that live in the human intestines and protect our bodies by stimulating the immune system. Geva-Zatorsky will use her award to continue investigating what leads the bacterial molecule, known as polysaccharide A (PSA), to react this way.

"There are 10 times more bacteria than human cells in the body, and I'm learning how... we interact with them and what the impact is on our health," she said in a phone interview from Brookline, Mass., where she has been living since September 2011 with her husband, Amnon Zatorsky, and their two sons, Yonatan, 5, and Uri, 2.

Despite the growing popularity of probiotics in an array of products – think of kefir, a dairy product made of goat's milk and fermented grains, or the trendy tea-based drink kombucha, not to mention numerous frozen-yogurt confections – both the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and the European Food Safety Authority say most claims made for probiotic products are unproven.



Naama Geva-Zatorsky

"There's really a lot more that can be studied," Geva-Zatorsky said, noting that researchers already know that probiotics can be used to treat inflammatory bowel disease and now are investigating whether microbacteria can inoculate against multiple sclerosis, a chronic autoimmune disease that affects the central nervous system.

Additionally, Geva-Zatorsky said, certain bacteria can make humans develop more fat cells. Someday, she said, researchers may be able to create a pill to help obese people lose weight.

The same bacteria affect emotions, she said, and eventually may be used to treat depression.

Once her postdoctoral work is completed, Naama Geva-Zatorsky plans to return to Israel to set up her own research team to probe how these bacteria can treat a myriad of diseases.

Noting that experiments are tedious and often fail, Kam said in an email that the young scientist "never complained, never was let down, and never gave up! Her optimistic spirit and joy of doing science was never broken by the tough reality."

Geva-Zatorsky's success is unusual in Israel given a dearth of women working in the fields of science and engineering.

Despite Israel's emphasis on research and development, a 2008 report by the European Commission on Gender Equality pointed out Israel's low proportion of female researchers in higher education – 25 per cent, compared to the 35 per cent average among EU member countries.

Women in the Israeli scientific community were recently outraged and re-energized to speak out about their important role as researchers after a highly publicized January incident in which Channa Maayan, a Hebrew University professor, received an award but was told by Israel's haredi health minister that a male would have to accept it for her.

There are glimmers of light, however, for female scientific researchers. Geva-Zatorsky was among 10 women last year who received a Weizmann Institute of Science Women in Science Award. And she sees momentum at Israeli universities to increase the numbers of women in the field.

She hopes that she can pave the way for others. "I encourage women to be brave and ask questions," Geva-Zatorsky said.

Geva-Zatorsky said gender bias alone is not the only reason that women are less inclined to do scientific research.

Geva-Zatorsky, who grew up in Moshav Ometz, a small cooperative village in central Israel, said her parents "nourished her curiosity and passion."

At 22, she arrived at Tel Aviv University and decided to study chemistry and biology. For her doctorate, she studied how cancer cells respond to drugs and therapies.

One rabbi's unforgettable lessons

Elisha Porat
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

In October 1976 I went up to Jerusalem to study Judaism. Friends had recommended that I try to cure my ongoing shell shock, dating from October 1973, by immersing myself in the ancient Hebrew texts. My friend, the writer and thinker Yariv Ben Aharon, suggested that I also study with Rabbi Prof. David Hartman. Yariv had studied not under him, but with him, and they became a student-teacher pair who filled each other with knowledge.

That accursed war had stuck its claws deep inside me. Each of the others in my military unit returned to his home and his work, and they happily resumed their previous lives. I couldn't. The sights and sounds from the burning Golan Heights and the shelled enclave haunted me not only at night, but during the day as well. And even writing poems about memories of the war, to which I became addicted for a short time, didn't help. I walked around my house and the kibbutz like a sleepwalker. Until I took my friends' advice and went up to Jerusalem. The first meeting with David Hartman was moving. Seated opposite me was a man with excellent diagnostic abilities, who within seconds understood who sat before him. He spoke freely in three languages – English, Hebrew and Yiddish – and was surprised that I didn't know a word of our "mamaloshen." He made me a very generous offer, which included financial support for my studies. I found the man very interesting. I felt that he had a strong sense of mission in addition to a genuine passion for teaching. His words about the importance of secularism in Israeli life surprised me. As did his harsh criticism of the religious establishment. We sat in his spacious apartment on Graetz Street, and his wife and children passed through the room several times. He was very proud of them, and his gaze followed them even after they had left. On the spot he gave me a considerable sum of cash, and sent me off to purchase a basic library of Judaism.

That year I studied with him in two classes. One discussed the philosophy of Maimonides and the other dealt with the figure and teachings of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik. I was an independent student, far older than his young students. My curriculum was broader. I also audited Talmud classes, the lessons of Dan Pagis on medieval poetry, and those of Rabbi Menachem Froman, a unique poet and peacemaker.

Rabbi David Hartman

Hartman's lessons soon became famous, and a class that would begin with a small group on the Mount Scopus or Givat Ram campus of the Hebrew University would end up in a large auditorium. I had never seen anything like the students who would drag their chairs down the corridors in pursuit of their rabbi. His lectures were magical. His young fans sat under the lecturer's desk and recorded his every word. He had an amazing sense of linguistic maneuvering, and he would roam among his three languages with amazing artistry. The transition from Hebrew to English and the seasoning in Yiddish, all in a strong American accent, was fascinating. I often found myself speaking in this broken language with the young American students with whom I shared my tiny cubicle.

After one or two lessons, he had already identified the outstanding students, or those whom he wanted to single out, and he would suddenly turn to them, speaking very personally, above the heads of the other students. It may not have been democratic, but it was wonderful. I remember the respect he showed for Yoske Ahituv, a talmid chacham (outstanding Torah scholar) and member of Kibbutz Ein Tzurim. Yoske would regularly come late to class because of the bus schedule. Hartman would stop his lesson, introduce Yoske to his listeners, exchange a few words with him, and include in them respect for the man, his scholarship and his identification with the kibbutz.

Only one thing annoyed me at the time. I remember that suddenly someone would announce, "Gentlemen, Minchah!" and the kipah-wearers in the auditorium would gather for the afternoon prayer. It was embarrassing and unpleasant. We, the secular students, didn't join in. I mentioned it to him politely, and I think he accepted my opinion. He knew how to accept the other at his full value.

Jerusalem had turned into the capital of Israeli optimism, which was undergoing rehabilitation after the war. Gush Emunim was starting out, and Shimon Peres, to undermine the policy of Yitzhak Rabin, opened the doors of Samaria to the settlers. The settlement movement suddenly picked up speed.

'May the man enjoy a good and long life'

The city was filled with would-be prophets, self-appointed consolers, and all kinds of weirdos and cult leaders. The heavy depression that prevailed in the cities of the coastal plain did not ascend to Jerusalem. Here, semi-messianic visions of reforms and redemptions flourished, and groups of conquerors of the hills of Benjamin gathered there.

Even Rabbi Menachem Froman, the peacemaker, placed the roof of the house where he lived with his wife and two children at the disposal of the conquerors. I once went up to the roof by chance and saw the foam rubber mattresses rolled up and ready, and next to them the sleeping bags. Just like the equipment in the Israel Defense Forces emergency warehouses. About 35 years have passed since then, but I haven't forgotten the defiant, "despite everything" spirit in evidence in the renewed Jewish Quarter, among the cranes and the bulldozers.

My friend, the late Nehemiah Ginzburg, a member of Kibbutz Givat Haim Ihud, was an admirer of Hartman. He also admired the Orthodox philosopher and teacher Yeshayahu Leibowitz. He begged me to become even closer to Hartman and to listen carefully to his teaching. And that's what I did. I joined his select group of students, an elite chevrutah, a Jewish study group, that met at his home on Friday mornings. It was a genuine corrective experience for me, and one could even say purifying and cathartic. Hartman was even more brilliant in the intimate chevrutah than in the classroom. He permitted himself a surprising intimacy with his students, and the flattered chevrutah responded willingly to his overtures.

There's no question that the man is a great teacher. We studied chapters from the Schechter edition of Avot d'Rabbi Natan with him. He knew he had only a short time to teach before we all went home. And he did so with great charm.

The attractive house was already redolent of Shabbat, and his wife would come by, preoccupied with her preparations. Hartman would stop talking for a moment and send a long and lingering glance in her direction. Afterward he sighed and asked, "What does it say there, 'Three things enlarge a man's spirit,'" and we all completed the proverb with the words "a beautiful wife." He smiled to himself and returned to Avot d'Rabbi Natan. He didn't imagine, and neither did we, that he would suffer a harsh blow of bereavement when his son-in-law, a navigator in the air force, fell in Lebanon.

Once, I met him in the street, running. He stopped next to me for a short time and said, "Why are you surprised? In America, all the professors run." It may be the running that strengthens him, and, thanks to that, he celebrated his 80th birthday last year.

Some time after I returned to the coastal plain, dear Nehemiah summoned me for a consolation visit to Reb David's home. His two brothers, each of them a brilliant lecturer in his field, had passed away one after the other, before their time. We sat in his brother's house in Kiryat Krinitzi in Ramat Gan; visitors came and went, and they probably included people who were close to him and to the family. In spite of that, he found time for us and had a conversation with us, with Nehemiah and me, as though his lesson had ended just yesterday and we were still standing in the corridor of the humanities department. I give him credit for that, too. May the man enjoy a good and long life; there are very many people who owe him thanks for the spiritual wealth they acquired in his company.

Canadians and Israelis work together through IsraAID

Shachar Zahavi
Special to the CJN

One one of the most devastating catastrophes in the history of Japan struck on March 11, 2011.

A massive earthquake and subsequent tsunami killed about 30,000 people, while destroying major parts of the country and leaving hundreds of thousands homeless.

Life, as these innocent men, women and children knew it, would never again be the same.

But, on March 11 the following year, a group of Japanese women – mainly teachers and social workers – from a small northern community met with an Israeli psychotherapist who specialized in treating post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), and is a member of IsraAID, an umbrella organization made up of Jewish and Israeli relief groups that provide aid worldwide. This was the first time these women had discussed PTSD with anyone.

In a country where expressing one's innermost feelings is far from being socially acceptable, IsraAID's direct yet sensitive approach was the right one.

The knowledge that Israel has acquired over the decades from trauma experience is being used in Japan – and, in fact, around the world – with the assistance of Jewish and Israeli professionals, and is helping people and changing communities.

"Necessity is the mother of invention" is an old adage, yet today this has a new meaning. Global innovation is often born from our experiencing man-made and natural disasters.

In the 64 years of its existence, Israel has faced numerous challenges and difficulties, including an arid climate, social instability, a complex security situation, wars and an influx of new olim.

And yet, over the years, IsraAID's partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the largest financial supporter of IsraAID's initiatives – be they in Burma, Haiti, Japan, Kenya, South Sudan or any other country – has helped transform the lives of thousands of people worldwide and has strengthened and deepened the connection between Israeli and Diaspora Jews.

Israel's own need for urgent yet long-term sustainable solutions in challenging circumstances throughout its history has made it a world leader in various fields.

Israel has matured into an economic powerhouse, a technological and agricultural innovator, the creator of conveniences that we take for granted, a producer of live-saving devices and an expert in rapid response humanitarian relief and sustainable development, and a true leader of the Jewish world.

Toronto's federation saw IsraAID as a meaningful partner and directed its global humanitarian aid programming into an Israeli-led initiative, rather than a Diaspora-led initiative. Federation supports IsraAID's search-and-rescue efforts and its first-rate team of medical experts in their life-saving efforts around the world, wherever lives are in jeopardy.

IsraAID's innovative response teams have brought a whole new dimension to the world of development work and the concept of tikkun olam. The combination of Jews from all around the world bringing professional skills, know-how, experience and passion, and working in cooperation with the local community, has created a new realm of action and activity.

IsraAID workers offer help in Japan.

Like the State of Israel, the development of these programs was – and still is – a long and complex one.

Israel evolved from a desert to a startup nation listed third in the world for registered patents per capita. Japanese people are now discussing PTSD through song, dance and art, and Israelis are training social workers in Africa's newest nation, South Sudan, to address gender-based violence.

In today's world, continents and communities with thousands of miles and vast cultural disparities between them see themselves as being part of a global community.

Although more connected than ever, we are still faced with numerous challenges, including conflicts over natural resources and land.

But rather than looking at the difficulties, we must seize the opportunity, strengthening not only the Israel-Diaspora connection but the global community connection, too.

By reaching out to countries in need and sharing Israel's hands-on approach and experience, we are also creating a platform where Diaspora and Israeli Jews can connect and co-operate.

We must continue our efforts to better the world. Canada and Israel are unique in the sense that we are compassionate toward others, we listen and we are always willing to use our skills to work with the needy to better the world.

Hunger Games Israeli video hits jackpot

Alexandra Halpern
JTA

NEW YORK — It's post-apocalyptic America and you're in District 12 of Panem. With your bow and arrow, you are helping Katniss Everdeen hunt for meat and berries to bring back to your family. President Snow, the evil dictator, is planning the next Hunger Games, in which children are placed in an arena to fight to the death – and you might be chosen.

This is the world that Funtactix, a company founded in Israel, has created on Facebook along with Lionsgate and Hunger Games author Suzanne Collins.

With social network games – typically played online through a social network such as Facebook or on a mobile device – replacing the console system as the standard in recent years, Funtactix finds itself well positioned.

The Hunger Games Adventures is just the latest conquest for a company that has been receiving plenty of hype from gaming experts for integrating social gaming with big brand marketing. Last year, Funtactix partnered with Paramount Pictures and Warner Bros. to create Facebook games centered on Rango, Mission: Impossible and New Boyz.

Now it seems to have hit the jackpot: Funtactix is the first company to launch a Facebook game released on the same date as the movie on which it is based.

Half a billion people play social games, according to Funtactix CEO Sam Glassenberg.

"Traditional console-based movie games reached only those hard-core gamer movie fans that both loved the film and owned a specific gaming console," he said. "With social games there is no barrier to entry, no expensive game console required."

Funtactix began as a startup company in Tel Aviv in 2006, and now has offices in New York, Jerusalem and Los Angeles.

So how did this young company born in Israel, which is second only to Silicon Valley in its per capita concentration of startups, connect with big names such as Paramount, Warner Bros. and Lionsgate?

"Convincing a film studio or director to bring their upcoming film to the medium of social games is no easy task," Glassenberg said.

But his team of Israelis had decades of combined experience building games for movies and was able to parlay existing relationships with Hollywood.

The company has carved "out a unique niche," said Scott Steinberg, who heads the technology consulting firm TechSavvy Global.

Funtactix may be making it big at the box office, but its technology is standard, according to Ron Weaver, a faculty member at the Florida Interactive Entertainment Academy.

Several Facebook games have been set up in conjunction with TV shows, and content and technology updates are common for all games, as there are no barriers on the Facebook platform.

A scene from *Hunger Games

"Funtactix's implementation of console-quality graphics within Flash is not a lone effort," Weaver told JTA. "Kudos to Funtactix for helping to lead the charge, but fortunately they are not alone."

Glassenberg, who had worked for Microsoft, says one of the reasons he left the company to join Funtactix in 2008 was to help build the games industry in Israel.

"From personal experience, I know that Israel has the potential to make a huge contribution to the global games industry," he said, noting that the $100-billion-a-year industry will serve to enhance the nation economically and culturally, providing education and talent retention.

His Zionism and Funtactix's Israelis roots were among the things that drew him to the company.

"Israel has a great deal to contribute to the global games industry. Funtactix is just scratching the surface," Glassenberg said. "We have established a reputation in Hollywood for Israeli game development. We hope this will serve as a catalyst for a much larger games ecosystem in Israel."

Indeed, he'd like to see Funtactix pave the way for other Israeli startups.

Pointing to the powerhouse Google, which recently announced its plans to set up an Israel-based "incubator" to host and fund about 20 entrepreneurs, Glassenberg says big companies want access to Israeli talent.

Volunteer retiree program celebrates 30 years

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Twenty-nine years ago, a group of Canadian Jewish retirees decided they had had enough of winter vacations in Florida. Looking for a new, active and productive way to spend the cold Canadian winter, they eventually settled on Israel as the perfect destination.

This decision led to the birth of the Jewish National Fund's (JNF) Canadian American Active Retirees in Israel (CAARI) program, which is gearing up to run its thirtieth annual cycle in January and February 2013. To prepare for this milestone year, co-ordinator Susan Horwitz visited from Israel in late May for a CAARI information session.

"We tour all over the country – from the Galil to Eilat," said Horwitz to the crowd of interested retirees, many enthusiastic returning participants, at Temple Emanu-El in Toronto.

The program includes tours of historic sites and lesser-known points of interest, and also includes community volunteering, speakers and of course, socializing. "To me, it's one big family," said Horwitz, adding that the participants make the program what it is. "I love their enthusiasm, I love their spirit," she said.

CAARI participants range in age from their 50s all the way into their 90s, and the program offers options to join at various points for as little as two weeks or as much as seven weeks.

For Frances Dvorchik, who has participated six times, CAARI was her introduction to Israel. "It felt like home," she said of her first visit, adding that the warmer weather and stimulating program make for a good winter getaway. "I love the program," she said, explaining that each year brings new speakers, new sites and new experiences. "There's a lot of variety."

About 60 participants each year enjoy camel rides, folk-dancing lessons, trips to museums, tours of chocolate and cheese factories and visits to various JNF projects throughout the country. There are also special talks by Members of Knesset, professors and archaeologists.

But for most returning participants, volunteering in Israeli schools is the most memorable. "It was a pleasure to see kids so keen," said Irving Green, who participated with his wife Barbara two years ago. Green said spending time tutoring young students in English was not only a joy, but also a new way to see Israel as an insider and not just as a tourist.

Anice Stark, CAARI chair for JNF Canada, first went on the trip in 1995 and has been going back ever since. "I don't think I've heard a bad word about the program in all these years," she told The CJN.

In recent years, Canadian participants have begun to outnumber those from the United States, a fact that Horwitz attributes in part to Toronto's tight-knit Jewish connections. "There's a different Jewish community here," she said.

Horwitz is looking forward to the thirtieth anniversary trip in January, eager to meet participants and to introduce or re-introduce them to Israel the CAARI way. "I love Israel, and I love showing people the land."

Jerusalem

By Baruch Cohen

Jerusalem, the city of Psalms, tears and joy.
O! Jerusalem, embraced forever
With thy people's love
O! Jerusalem, a jewel
Lingering in our hearts!

Lightning, thunder endlessly
From generation to generation – to infinity!
From Eden with tears,
Showering Your people with love.
With bliss in every soul,
A song of praise for golden Jerusalem.

I bring praise to you Zion
And thanks forever and ever.
Because I live with eternal
Love for you!

Children with and without autism learn together

Israel21c

Visit Yad Hamoreh elementary school in Jerusalem on a Friday morning and you'll hear Shabbat songs, smell pizza and challah rolls baking in the oven, and see autistic children enjoying both activities with their "regular" peers.

"This school has been incredible," says Alana Goldstein, whose autistic fourth-grader recently won second place at a peer-judged A Star is Born talent show at the school. "These are low-functioning kids with behaviours that are not easy to deal with. And the regular children actually grow up with them. They learn to see the autistic children as part of their society."

Yad Hamoreh (teacher's hand) is a one-of-a-kind public elementary school. Founded in 1998, it now integrates 187 non-autistic kids in grades 1 to 6 with 49 severely to moderately autistic peers. Mostly separated for academics, the kids do everything else together, from eating to swimming. Regular kids even join in therapy sessions involving games, sports, music, animal care and horticulture.

Students dancing at Yad Hamoreh

Because hers is a model school with no exact counterpart anywhere, principal Ana Goren often hosts visiting educators from other Israeli municipalities, as well as eastern European countries, South America, China and the United States.

Zvi Shamir, uncle of an autistic niece and father of three normal daughters who have all attended Yad Hamoreh, explains that the first- through sixth-grade school was a parent-led initiative.

"It was based on a system developed by a kindergarten nearby that merged regular and autistic children," Shamir told ISRAEL21c. "This is a unique experiment in the world, we believe."

Judging by the enthusiasm of his second-grader, Lia, the experiment is a success. "What do you like about your school?" ISRAEL21c asked, and Lia Shamir broke into a grin. "Everything," she said.

Goldstein's son cannot verbalize quite as well, yet his mom can tell he's happy and she gets daily written reports from his teachers.

"When our son was in his last year of [special] kindergarten, this was the only offer we had for him," she says. "We were assured it would be the best place for him."

The Education Ministry handles placement for the autistic children at Yad Hamoreh. The other children, however, must apply to the school, and demand exceeds availability. You might not think parents would want their children exposed to the sometimes scary screeching and head-banging behaviours autistic children may display, but Goren's behaviour-modification approach appears to work wonders.

"Having regular children around makes the autistic children more aware," Goldstein says. "The regular children also gain because they have so many unusual things going on here. The facilities are like what you'd expect in a private school."

'A belief that this is worth fighting for'

It's not magic, stresses Su Narodowski, an educational instructor who works with special education teachers, pupils and parents at Yad Hamoreh.

"It doesn't work easily or without hiccups. Our teachers have to be very flexible. The regular and special ed teachers have to think of activities that allow both populations to participate, and behind that is a belief that this is worth fighting for."

Shamir says his girls learned respect and tolerance not only for kids with autism but also for people with a range of differences. The school includes religious and secular, Jewish and Arab pupils, along with a multiethnic staff of administrators, teachers, therapists and community and national service volunteers.

"It's monumental that kids who leave this school have a value system, a social understanding, that is not an innate expectation," Narodowski told ISRAEL21c.

"At first they may be a bit wary of this kid who's wiggling his fingers and making weird noises. Then suddenly they realize, 'I want to go on stage and hold his hand.' When you grow day by day with someone for six years, you learn to see very clearly what a person is made of."

The choir at Yad Hamoreh

It doesn't work easily or without hiccups. Our teachers have to be very flexible

Shamir also said the social modelling at Yad Hamoreh leads to remarkable achievements for the special kids.

"When [autistic children] learn with regular children, they have to adopt the modes of behaviour of the regular society," Shamir said. "Based upon research at the Hebrew University, we have the basis for our assumption that these children reach much, much higher levels of participation in society."

Yad Hamoreh parents and siblings are welcome at school trips and events. "One of the main problems for the families of children with autism is their participation as a unit in the community," Shamir said. "The community created by this school is very good for both kinds of families."

The past two summers, Goldstein was pleasantly surprised when both autistic and regular classmates came to her son's birthday parties. "Even though it was in the middle of the summer, more than half the regular children came," she said.

Inclusive extracurricular activities are critical to the school's culture. A student choir of 43 kids includes four autistic children. When regular fifth-graders go for mandatory swimming lessons, their autistic classmates come along, although they have their own weekly hydrotherapy sessions. Narodowski said it took some persuasion for the Education Ministry to allow such an arrangement.

With everything going on at Yad Hamoreh, its school day is two hours longer than most other Israeli public schools. But Lia Shamir doesn't mind at all.

"What do you wish will happen today at school?" ISRAEL21c asked the second-grader.

"That the day won't finish," she replied with a giggle.

A search for books and roots

Ben Sales
JTA

The works of Shmuel Yosef Agnon, Israel's only winner of the Nobel Prize for literature, are on the shelves of nearly every Israeli bookstore. Readers seeking S.Y. Agnon's writing can access several editions of his novels, novellas and short stories.

This year, on the 100th anniversary of that book's publication, an Israeli organization is searching for the first copies of Agnon's first novella, And the Crooked Shall Be Made Straight. An unusual tale lies behind the book's first printing: Yosef Haim Brenner, who in 1912 was a more prominent Hebrew author than Agnon, liked the latter's writing and sold a pair of suspenders to fund the novella's publication. At the time, Agnon had published popular short stories but not longer works.

Brenner printed 50 editions of the novella in Jerusalem, sending 30 to a small community of Hebrew speakers in New York who had emigrated from Agnon's native Galicia, an area that overlaps the border of present-day Poland and Ukraine.

A century later, just two of those 50 editions have been located: one in Israel's national library and the other in the Agnon family's private collection.

Agnon House, the group that maintains the author's Jerusalem home as a museum, is on a mission to find others.

Although the writer, who died in 1970, lived in Jerusalem, And the Crooked Shall Be Made Straight is among his few works that were printed there.

"We saw a lot of symbolism in this," said Eilat Liber, director of Agnon House. "He wanted to live in Jerusalem. In his [1966] Nobel Prize speech, he said he felt 'as one who was born in Jerusalem,'" even though he was born in Galicia.

The hunt has taken Liber far from Agnon's beloved city, with Agnon House searching the United States for books. The search has yielded nothing – not even a few leads, although Liber hopes to find copies in American libraries and private collections. During a cursory search, JTA was able to locate copies of a later 1912 printing of the book from Jaffa, at Brandeis University and The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, but not a first edition.

The search is one of a few efforts this year to celebrate And the Crooked Shall Be Made Straight, which follows a childless couple through tragedy in Agnon's native town of Buczacz, in present-day Ukraine. The novella's first English translation is expected to be completed by the end of this year. Michael Kramer, the translator, praised Agnon's rich and intricate language. Agnon's writing in the novella and in later works is laden with allusions to the Talmud, midrash, Bible and chassidic tales.

Using the book's first edition, Kramer said, will allow him to translate with greater accuracy and better knowledge of Agnon's intent.

"When I started translating the book, it was clear that it was a kind of mission impossible," said Kramer, a professor at Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv. "On the one hand, I wanted to create a text that would render the story in an interesting and accessible way, but on the other hand, reading Agnon in Hebrew demands the kind of cultural literacy that is untranslatable."

Shmuel Yosef Agnon

To stay faithful to Agnon's textual references, Kramer is using the King James Bible and legalistic, talmudic language. He believes the story, despite the esoteric nature of Agnon's writing, is relevant to American Jews.

The window Agnon provides into the world of eastern European Jewry also has begun to attract a new generation of Israeli readers to the author, said Liber.

"For many years, Israelis didn't want to know about Jewish life in the Diaspora, and now there's more interest in Yiddish and in the generation of Agnon," Liber said. In another aspect of the celebration, Liber plans to lead a trip to Galicia to explore Agnon's roots.

That world may seem alien to today's readers, but Alan Mintz, an Agnon expert and translator, said that And the Crooked Shall Be Made Straight was revolutionary to Hebrew readers a century ago, when most books about eastern Europe satirized life there.

"He took a chance writing his first longer work going back to eastern Europe and showing that this is a world in which serious ethical and human dilemmas could be portrayed," said Mintz, a professor at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. While the translation's publisher, Matthew Miller, thinks Jewish readers will enjoy the novella, he expects that many copies will be bought for college classes on Hebrew literature.

Miller's Toby Press has published some of Agnon's better-known works, such as To This Day and A Simple Story.

Lamenting a decline in Jewish literacy among American Jews most likely to read novels, Miller hopes that this book will introduce readers to the wide variety of Jewish texts.

South Koreans show high interest in Israel

Michael Orbach
JTA

It's become a mainstay of Saturday nights on the Ben Yehuda Street pedestrian mall in Jerusalem.

It's one of the most public signs of Israel's small but growing Korean community, many of whom come to the Holy Land because they are evangelical Christians. Not far from Ben Yehuda, there is a Korean restaurant on nearby Shamai Street and five small Korean churches.

"Israel reflects the truth of the Tanach," said Yung Doo, using the Hebrew word for Bible. A Korean man in his late 30s, he moved to Israel two years ago with his family to pursue a graduate degree in Bible studies. "This is the land of David and Saul."

Ilsoo Kim, South Korea's ambassador to Israel

While official estimates are hard to come by, South Korea's ambassador to Israel, Ilsoo Kim, estimates that there are about 800 Koreans in about 300 families living in Israel. The number, he said, has been growing in recent years. They mainly reside around the French Hill and Pisgat Ze'ev neighbourhoods in the Jerusalem area.

"Many have lived here quite a long time," Kim said. "This reflects their feelings."

Most Koreans in Israel are visitors on multi-year student visas. Many study Bible at Israeli universities or at Holy Land University, a Christian graduate school that caters to Asians. Roughly 30 per cent of Koreans are Christian.

A handful have come to Israel to stay. Kim OK Kyung, 67, is a gregarious Korean-American transplant who arrived from New Jersey three years ago with her husband, a pastor, who had just retired from his church.

"There is no place in the world like Jerusalem," said Kyung, who calls herself Hannah, after the mother of the biblical Samuel, and peppers her speech with quotations from the Bible.

"He who blesses the children of Abraham will be blessed and he who curses Israel will be cursed," she said, citing a passage often quoted by evangelical Christians. "The president of Iran cursed Israel. I want to see what will happen to him."

Some Koreans here have had difficulties adjusting to life in the Jewish state.

"It's not easy to approach Israelis," said Eunah Hur, who spends her day learning Hebrew in Jerusalem and attends a messianic church near her apartment. But it's possible "to have good relationships. Israelis are warm and loyal," she said. "We have a specific word for these relationships – 'jung.' It's different from love and friendship."

There are a number of similarities between Israeli and Korean cultures: a strong focus on education, a proficient high-tech sector, compulsory military service for males and, perhaps most importantly, an existential threat from neighbours.

"The North invaded [Korea] once in 1950," Kim said. "Then the 1967 war took place [in Israel] and people saw what Israelis were doing: overwhelming their enemies' forces. Our teachers told us to learn from Israel. If [the North] invades, we have to do the same thing. Our memory of Israel started that day."

Both Israel and South Korea also are in similar straits due to their limited natural resources, he said. "Without natural resources how can you have results? Human capital," Kim said.

South Korea and Israel established full diplomatic relations in 1962. Today, the trade volume between them is roughly $2.5 billion annually; it is especially heavy in automobiles and cell phones. In 2007, Korea-based Samsung acquired Transchip, an Israeli microchip design firm that specialized in image sensors in digital cameras. Israeli streets are filled with Korean-made Hyundais and Kias. Korea also buys Israeli weapons to the tune of almost $50 million a year, according to Kim.

Hyounju Ji, who lives in Kibbutz Kfar Menachem, is one of an estimated 40 Koreans in Israel married to Israelis. As a volunteer at the kibbutz 13 years ago, she met the man who would become her husband. She married him over her parents' objections.

"Korea is a really closed society. They don't like mixed couples," she said. "Israeli and Korean character is very similar. They're both so proud of their people and want to keep their uniqueness."

Israel shows off its homeland security technologies

Mati Wagner
JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's security technologies were on display as the country hosted two separate international contingents last month.

An Interpol European Regional Conference brought 110 senior law enforcement officers from 49 countries to Tel Aviv, while a homeland security conference drew 37 mayors from two dozen worldwide cities to sites throughout Israel last week.

"Israel has been forced to overcome difficult circumstances, including war and terror, in order to survive," said Alfred Vanderpuije, mayor of the Ghana capital of Accra, following a visit to Elbit Systems, a defence electronics company based in Haifa. "And this has put the Israelis in a unique situation to develop security technologies."

In the decade following the terror attacks of 9-11, Israeli security exports rose from about $2 billion a year to more than $7 billion, according to data supplied by SIBAT, Israel's Defence Export and Defense Co-operation Agency. Part of the rise was attributed to the growing international demand for more effective homeland security systems.

At Elbit and other security firms such as Magal Security Systems and Elta Group, a subsidiary of Israel Aerospace Industries, Vanderpuije and the other mayors saw presentations on defence technologies.

Originally developed for the Israel Defence Forces to fight wars and terror, many of the systems are being modified for civilian use, such as securing large cities.

Called the "digital army project," Elbit's technology connects all military forces to a single communication network that enables the free transfer of audio and video information.

"From the individual soldier to entire divisions on the land, in the air and on the sea, all our forces are interconnected," said Dalia Rosen, Elbit's vice-president of corporate communications.

"In the past few years, we have begun adopting the tools we have developed and applied on the battlefield for use in a civilian context to create what we call 'safe cities.'"

The basic tools that are used to fight terror can be used to fight crime and help officials react more efficiently to natural disasters, said Amnon Sofrim, who heads Elta's homeland security projects.

"Instead of endless patrols, we can use strategically placed cameras or electronic devices connected to a situation room to detect the beginning of a robbery or a fire," said Sofrim, former chief of the IDF's intelligence corps. "And this allows us to use a limited amount of security forces or firefighters only where they are really needed."

There were signs that the meetings between mayors and Israeli security experts might lead to business ties.

"I was very impressed with what I saw and am even thinking about bringing some of these ideas back to Ghana," Vanderpuije said.

While private Israeli firms were showing the mayors homeland security technologies, a similar show-and-tell was taking place in Tel Aviv at Interpol's 41st regional conference, the first time Israel has hosted such a conference since it joined the international police organization in October 1949.

Among the Israeli innovations on display were the "skunk," a liquid with a putrid odor, and the "screamer," a hand-held device the size of a bullhorn that emits a sound so loud that it can paralyze.

Israeli police developed both as non-lethal means of crowd control in the wake of the October 2000 riots that left 12 Arab Israelis dead.

The Or Commission, an Israeli panel of inquiry set up after the riots, criticized the police for being unprepared and possibly using excessive force to disperse the mobs.

"The skunk and the screamer are more ethical than your average police baton, since they don't cause long-term injuries," said Cmdr. Oded Shemla, who heads research and development for the police technology division. "They also happen to be more effective."

An interactive simulator capable of constructing realistic scenarios, from soccer game riots and violent demonstrations to kidnappings and sniper attacks, also was on display.

"What is unique about our technology is that it is developed by police for police," said Shemla, who previously was a police helicopter unit pilot.

Interpol officials were not authorized to comment on Israel's innovations vis-a-vis other member countries.

Shemla said, however, that senior police officers from Europe were particularly impressed that the Israeli technologies presented at the conference already were in use and had proven to be effective in real-life situations.

"We were not showing them an abstract concept," he said. "We were showing them things that actually work in the field."

Jack Rosen, who chairs the American Council for World Jewry that organized and sponsored the international mayors' conference, said there is room for more security export growth.

"One of the goals of this year's conference is to break down prejudices [toward Israel] and overcome feelings of hesitation about doing business here," Rosen said. "We have to be proactive in allowing access to Israeli know-how and in countering anti-Israel sentiment."

Rosen said that political leaders such as Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who has claimed that Israel plans to "terminate" the Palestinian people, are "obstacles to openness" when it comes to economic ties with Israel.

However, Rosen noted that Venezuela should not be seen as monolithic. Antonio Ledezma, who beat a pro-Chavez candidate to become mayor of Caracas, attended the conference.

Otto Perez Leal, the mayor of Mixco, Guatemala, and son of Guatemalan President Otto Perez Molina, said his municipality already was implementing security cameras and other technologies developed in Israel.

"Our army and police use this equipment to integrate our forces and improve our ability to respond to natural disasters and other challenges," Leal said.

"It's not just about training people and it's not just about technology. It's about combining them both. And that is something that we are learning from you."

Greener ties between Jordan and Israel

Karin Kloosterman
Israel21c.com

In wealthy western countries, renewable energy developments are a source of progress, pride and smart business. For Israel and Jordan, two Middle Eastern countries severely lacking in water and energy resources, renewable energy is a matter of survival.

That's why there's been a new green twist to the Trilateral Industrial Development Foundation (TRIDE), founded in 1996 as a pilot project under the wing of the BIRD Foundation – the Israel-U.S. Binational Industrial Research and Development Foundation — to create joint ventures between Israeli, Jordanian and American companies.

The co-operative project will now support water, agritech and renewable energy companies in the two neighbouring nations, which have a peace treaty but only limited dealings.

BIRD executive director Eitan Yudilevich said that Jordan is supported heavily by USAID because the U.S. State Department considers it important to contribute to a stable and prospering Jordan for the sake of peace and economic development. TRIDE, run out of BIRD's Israel office, gives matching grants of up to half a million dollars to three partners with mutual goals.

TRIDE has already funded a handful of partnerships, most recently a research project started in 2009 to produce a second-generation synthetic diesel biofuel from organic raw materials.

The Trilateral Industrial Development Foundation (TRIDE) brings together U.S., Israeli and Jordanian companies in joint ventures such as producing renewable energy.

The Israeli company MME IL, the National Energy Research Center in Jordan and the Florida-based Nibor Enterprises set out to "map the existence of raw materials in Jordan and in Israel and to build a model to see if the process can be financially viable," Yudilevich said.

"I think in this type of project it is important to mention that there were a great many visits from both the Jordanians into Israel and the Israelis into Jordan," he stressed. "There were thousands of e-mails between them, and Skype calls every week."

The next stage is to use the results to set up a plant close to the raw material sources, whether in Jordan, Israel or on the southern border between the two.

The biofuel can be produced from forest residues, olive-processing waste, digester sludge, chicken manure and all types of organic raw materials, Yudilevich said. Right now, the companies involved are looking for financing to build the pilot plant.

"We are now in touch with both an Israeli and Jordanian company on energy efficiency. They already have a relationship, and we are waiting for their proposal. It's a very promising project in agricultural technologies to improve the quality of seed plants."

The so-called Arab Spring hasn't made any difference in how Israeli and Jordanian partners do business, said Yudilevich, who frequently makes the trip over the border.

He said that looking at the trends, trade has actually improved between Israel and Jordan over the last year. He believes that investing in, and participating in, projects like TRIDE can further advance the peace process in ways that government negotiations cannot achieve.

"There are two aspects to this," said Yudilevich, a Chilean-born Israeli Jew. "The clear aspect is that we have neighbours, and if we have trade with our neighbours, it is good for our economy. Now, it won't be a huge amount of trade in economic value because other markets are larger, like China. [However,] clearly economic value is no less important than creating this relationship which makes the peace treaty [between Israel and Jordan], still relatively cold, into a peace treaty among the people."

Jerusalem's buried Roman legacy

Nir Hasson
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

If you look at a map of the Old City of Jerusalem, you'll notice something odd. While the vast majority of the Old City's streets form a crowded casbah of winding alleyways, there are a few straight-as-a-ruler streets that bisect the city from north to south and east to west.

The best known of these straight roads are Beit Chabad and Hagai streets, exiting through the Damascus Gate; David Street, exiting the Jaffa Gate; and the Via Dolorosa.

Like the rest of the Old City's streets, these straight roads are narrow but, unlike the others, they preserve a historical skeleton of sorts that forms the basis of the Old City we know today. This skeleton was created, most archaeologists agree, not during Jewish, Christian or Muslim rule, but during the Roman period, when the city of Aelia Capitolina was built on the ruins of Jerusalem following the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 AD.

Ironically, it is actually the streets of this imperial and pagan city – which supposedly left behind no cultural or spiritual heritage for modern Jerusalem – that have bequeathed to the city the skeleton structure that has survived to this day.

In the history of Jewish Jerusalem, Aelia Capitolina is the very embodiment of defeat and destruction – a reminder of the humiliation of the Second Temple's destruction, which erected a pagan temple in its place. This image has distanced Aelia Capitolina from the fathers of Israeli archaeology, who were naturally drawn to the ornate, Jewish city that preceded it. "No one concealed Aelia Capitolina, but we wanted to talk about the Second Temple," says Ofer Sion, of the Antiquities Authority. "Aelia Capitolina was an accursed city, a city from which we were banished. It was more idealistic to excavate the Second Temple."

Almost all of the archaeologists who study Aelia Capitolina call it "an elusive city." As opposed to the Jerusalem of Second Temple times that preceded it, Aelia Capitolina has not been entirely unearthed during the many excavations that have been performed in the city since 1967. The residents of Aelia Capitolina did not leave written texts like the works of Flavius Josephus during the Second Temple era or of Christian travelers in the following period.

It is known that the Roman city was established by Emperor Hadrian between 130 and 140 CE. After the Bar Kochba revolt of 135, Jews were forbidden to enter the city. Its most important inhabitants were the soldiers of the 10th Legion, who would remain encamped in Jerusalem for 200 years.

Following the latest wave of excavations, which began in the mid-1990s, more and more archaeologists have become convinced that Aelia Capitolina was a much larger and more important city than was once thought, and its influence on the later development of modern Jerusalem was dramatic.

Aelia Capitolina has sprung to life in a significant way through no less than four extensive excavations that have taken place in the Old City area, and in a number of other digs in other parts of Jerusalem. Most of these digs have been rescue excavations by the Antiquities Authority, salvage digs carried out before new construction and development goes ahead. In a few more years, Aelia Capitolina could again be covered over by new buildings.

In the rear section of the Western Wall plaza, in the spot where the Western Wall Heritage Foundation intends to erect a large building that it calls "the Core House," Antiquities Authority researcher Shlomit Wexler-Bedolah discovered an ornate and broad Roman street, complete with shops on each side. This is the eastern cardo, along whose path Hagai Street would later be paved.

Temple Mount was used for pagan worship rites

Three hundred meters to the south, another Antiquities Authority researcher, Doron Ben-Ami, discovered the place where the Roman street apparently ended. The corner of the street is adjacent to the Givati parking lot at the top of the Silwan valley – the spot where the Elad organization intends to build a large visitors center. In a large rescue excavation at this location in recent years, Ben-Ami exposed a large, fancy Roman villa unlike any other structure from its time in the entire country. He estimates that the villa he uncovered was the home of the regional governor or some other central authority.

In another excavation, in the tunnel under the Western Wall, Wexler-Bedolah and archaeologist Alexander Onn re-estimated the dating of a large bridge leading to the Temple Mount. As with other ancient monuments, this turned out to be of Roman origin and not from the Second Temple period. Another example is the Roman bathhouse and swimming pool discovered by Sion a year and a half ago. "It's a tremendous spa, a country club," Sion says, comparing the bathhouse to similar facilities found in other parts of the Roman Empire.

This increasing number of Roman-era discoveries strengthens the notion that the Temple Mount, even after its destruction, did not lie totally barren, but was used for pagan worship rites.

But not only the Old City and its immediate surroundings have turned up new findings from Aelia Capitolina. Excavations made a few years ago in the area near the Binyanei Ha'uma international convention center, carried out in preparation for the expansion of the Crowne Plaza Hotel, uncovered a large pottery-workers village that served as the legion's central clayware manufacturing plant. Along the route of Jerusalem's new light rail line, remains of a large water facility serving the legionnaires were discovered, and in the area of Shuafat, a Jewish settlement from the same period was discovered.

The latest excavations give archaeologists much greater insight into Aelia Capitolina than was possible even a decade earlier. Experts agree the city was planned extraordinarily well, based as it was on designs of other cities in the empire and according to orders that came directly from the emperor. It included broad streets, numerous and magnificent entrance gates, temples and infrastructure, and it even housed a new elite of army officers and free soldiers who turned Aelia Capitolina into a thriving city.

"When I began to study the history of the Roman city, it was a barren field," says Prof. Yoram Zafrir, one of Israel's most veteran archaeologists. "Today, it is clear that the basic structure of Jerusalem is that of Aelia Capitolina." Zafrir describes the process by which, after the Roman period, beasts of burden replaced wagons, the central government became weak and streets became "privatized." This process led to the city that we know today.

"Similarly to the British Mandate, which lasted just 31 years but had a significant impact on modern Jerusalem, from the perspective of architecture, the Roman period established a whole new, imperial language that still holds sway today," archaeologist Guy Stiebel concludes. Stiebel even notes the irony of history: "Aelia Capitolina effectively saved Jerusalem. It raised her once again onto the stage of history. She returned like a phoenix from the ashes."

The top 12 ways Israel feeds the world

Israel21c.com

Food security is a major concern for our rapidly growing planet. As resources dwindle and population rises, smart solutions for better agriculture and safer food storage are essential.

No other single country – certainly not one as young and as tiny as Israel – has contributed more breakthroughs in this area.

Since the 1950s, Israelis have not only been finding miraculous ways to green their own desert but have shared their discoveries far and wide through channels including MASHAV, Israel's Agency for International Development Cooperation at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

1. Drip irrigation

Probably no other advancement has been quite as significant. While the concept of drip irrigation existed well before Israeli statehood, it was revolutionized by Israeli water engineer Simcha Blass, who serendipitously discovered that a slow and balanced drip led to remarkable growth. He created tubing that slowly released water where it was most effective, and in 1965 Kibbutz Hatzerim built a whole new industry, Netafim, based on his invention.

Using a Tipa kit in Senegal

Israeli drip and micro-irrigation solutions rapidly spread worldwide. The newest models are self-cleaning and maintain uniform flow rate regardless of water quality and pressure.

Just one recent example of how this method has impacted food supply in foreign countries is Tipa, literally "Drop," an Israeli-developed kit that has allowed 700 farming families in Senegal to reap crops three times a year instead of just once, even on infertile land.

Tipa is "a simple drip irrigation system that uses gravity when there is no water supply or water pressure coming to rural areas," MASHAV's Ilan Fluss said. Similar programs are at work in Kenya, South Africa, Benin and Niger.

2. Grain cocoons

Israeli-designed GrainPro Cocoons have provided a surprisingly simple and cheap way for African and Asian farmers to keep their grain market-fresh.

The huge bags, invented by international food technology consultant Shlomo Navarro, keep both water and air out. They're used all over the developed world, including Africa and the Far East, and even in countries that have no diplomatic ties to Israel, such as Pakistan.

As much as 50 per cent of every grain harvest and 100 per cent of every pulse harvest is commonly lost to pests and mould, said Navarro. Subsistence farmers in developing countries tend to store their crops in primitive baskets or bags, which are not effective in keeping hungry bugs and micro-contaminants out. The Cocoon solves that problem, even in extreme heat and humidity.

3. Biological pest control

On Kibbutz Sde Eliyahu, a company called Bio-Bee breeds beneficial insects and mites for biological pest control and bumblebees for natural pollination in greenhouses and open fields. Subsidiary Bio-Fly sells sterile Mediterranean fruit flies to control this major pest in fruit trees.

R&D manager Shimon Steinberg said the company's top seller worldwide is a two-millimetre-long, pear-shaped orange spider that is a highly efficient enemy of the spider mite, a devastating agricultural pest.

"Sixty per cent of California strawberries since 1990 are treated with this predatory mite from the Holy Land," he reported. In Israel, Bio-Bee products have enabled sweet-pepper farmers to reduce chemical pesticides by 75 per cent.

Bio-Bee exports eight different species of biological control agents, plus pollinating bumblebees, to 32 nations from Japan to Chile. Bio-Fly collaborates with Jordanian and West Bank Palestinian Authority agricultural experts.

4. Dairy farming

Hof Hasharon Dairy Farm, SAE Afikim and SCR Precise Dairy Farming all make advanced systems for herd management, monitoring and feeding used on dairy farms worldwide.

SAE Afikim is one of 10 Israeli companies involved in a five-year project in Vietnam to implement a vast $500 million dairy farm, the largest of its kind in the world.

Involving 30,000 cows at 12 state-of-the-art mega-dairies and a milk processing plant supplying 300 million litres per year, the operation is expected to produce 500,000 litres daily by the end of 2012.

In the meantime, China is sending groups of dairy farm manager trainees to Israel to learn how to boost milk production there as well.

5. Tailor-made farm solutions

Kibbutz-based Agricultural Knowledge On-Line (AKOL) makes unique software to help producers grow fruits and vegetables, raise poultry and dairy cows, manage vineyards and make olive oil.

Hosted in IBM's "cloud," AKOL's latest project gives farmers anywhere in the world access to information from Israeli experts. Hundreds of thousands of farmers can obtain tailor-made solutions, arrange group purchases of supplies and communicate with colleagues.

CEO Ron Shani said AKOL applications can advise farmers on when to plant, irrigate and harvest; how to cope with drought; how to choose the crops best for their area; how to implement ideal storage and temperature control procedures based on climate; and how to track the growth of chickens, livestock and fruit, among other ideas for running a modern, professional farm.

Sharing discoveries

6. A better potato

It took nearly 30 years of research, but Hebrew University's Prof. David Levy has developed strains of potatoes that thrive in hot, dry climates, and can be irrigated by saltwater.

Potatoes are one of the top sources of nutrition in the world, but they've never grown well in hot, desert regions like the Middle East. Now, farmers in these regions can grow potatoes as a cash crop.

Levy said he also intended his research to enhance understanding between Israel and its neighbours, as scientists and officials from Jordan, Egypt, Lebanon and Morocco meet with Israeli scientists to share knowledge and build bridges of information and technology.

7. Squeezing water from the air

Tal-Ya Water Technologies has developed reusable plastic trays to collect dew from the air, reducing the water needed by crops or trees by up to 50 per cent.

The square serrated trays, made from non-PET recycled and recyclable plastic with UV filters and a limestone additive, surround each plant or tree. With overnight temperature change, dew forms on both surfaces of the Tal-Ya tray, which funnels the dew and condensation straight to the roots. If it rains, the trays heighten the effect of each millimetre of water 27 times over.

Inventor and CEO Avraham Tamir said the trays also block the sun so weeds can't take root, and protect the plants from extreme temperature shifts. "Farmers need to use much less water, and in turn, much less fertilizer on the crop," which translates to less groundwater contamination.

8. Unparalleled crop protection

Two years ago, Hebrew University's tech-transfer company teamed up with Makhteshim Agan, a world leader in crop protection products, to develop and commercialize slow-release herbicides and a targeted insecticide that doesn't harm beneficial insects.

The total worldwide herbicide market is valued at more than $15 billion, of which approximately a quarter is dedicated to soil-applied herbicides and other pesticides. The Israeli approach incorporates herbicides into micelles or vesicles, microscopic capsules which are absorbed onto negatively charged clay minerals to enable a slow and controlled release, reducing leaching to deeper soil layers. This enhances efficiency and reduces the required doses. The novel insecticide kills caterpillars of night-flying moths – a common scourge for farmers worldwide – but unlike common commercial preparations, has minimal or no effect on any other creatures. High levels of control can be achieved with much less product, greatly minimizing environmental impact.

9. Fishing in the desert

Overfishing is a serious threat to the food supply, a grave situation since fish is the main source of protein for hundreds of millions of people. But what if fish could be raised virtually anywhere, even in the desert? That is just what the Israel's GFA (Grow Fish Anywhere) Advanced Systems has made possible.

The Israeli "zero-discharge" system eliminates the environmental problems in conventional fish farming, and doesn't depend on electricity or proximity to a body of water. Specially developed microbes purify fish waste byproducts right in the tank, with no need for spillage and refilling. The largest facility using GFA technology, in New York, produced about 100 tons of sea bream, bass and tilapia in 2010.

10. Food from greenhouse gas

Israel's Seambiotic clean-tech company recently launched a commercial algae farm in China and does business in the United States and Italy as well.

While people don't eat algae, algae ponds nourished by power-plant effluent can generate 30 times more feedstock (raw materials) for biofuel production than land-based crop alternatives, thus conserving farmed produce for human consumption.

Plus, the tiny plants, which thrive on carbon dioxide and sunlight, produce a valuable "nutraceutical" food additive that is especially popular in the Far East.

11. Reintroducing carp to Africa

Half a century ago, Lake Victoria carp was a significant part of the diet of the nearby Ugandan villagers. But when Nile perch was introduced to the lake, it drove smaller fish, including carp, to near-extinction. Villagers had neither the equipment nor the expertise necessary to start fishing the huge perch, and symptoms of protein deficiency started becoming apparent in their children.

Prof. Berta Sivan of Hebrew University came to the rescue with a multi-year project to help these African families. Her team has applied techniques developed over many years for Israeli fish farmers.

The Israeli project not only successfully spawned carp on Ugandan fish farms, but also provided training on how to dig and fill ponds to raise the small fish. Now local children have an abundant supply of protein to eat with their fruit and vegetables.

12. Hardier seeds for better crops

Hebrew University agricultural scientists Ilan Sela and Haim D. Rabinowitch developed TraitUP, a trademarked technology that enables the introduction of genetic materials into seeds without modifying their DNA. This method immediately and efficiently improves plants before they're even sowed. The university's Yissum Research Development technology transfer company licensed the seed treatment technology to Morflora Israel for curing fruit-tree diseases in orchards and groves, and for seedling treatment in the nursery.

"The new ability to deliver traits within days instead of years, and to offer a treatment with results similar to breeding to all current species, answers a long-unmet need that will revolutionize modern agriculture and significantly impact the vegetable and commodity crop markets," said Dotan Peleg, CEO of Morflora.

Putin visits Israel

Russian President Vladimir Putin, left, and Israeli President Shimon Peres, centre, with an unnamed Israeli veteran of Russia's wars, attended a ceremony in Netanya on Monday that unveiled a monument commemorating the Red Army's triumph over Nazi Germany. Speaking to a crowd of some 600, Putin said: "The white rock dove [of the monument] symbolizes the triumph of good and peace. May these values always serve as the basis for friendship between our nations." Peres responded that the "monument is a beacon of hope. Russia, which so greatly helped win the war, is the same Russia that can help achieve peace in the Middle East."

Canadian rabbis respond to Rabbi Amar

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Both the Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) and the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly have issued statements condemning comments made by Israel's Sephardi chief rabbi about non-Orthodox Judaism and its practitioners.

On June 17, Rabbi Shlomo Amar said in an interview with the haredi Kol Berama radio station that he would fight Israel's recent agreement to pay the salaries of some non-Orthodox rabbis who lead their communities.

"The greatest danger for our generation is the danger of assimilation, and we need to be strong and steadfast in our fight," Rabbi Amar said. "It is forbidden to remain silent because there is nothing more serious than this measure."

He also said the decision to recognize non-Orthodox rabbis could "uproot all the foundations of the Torah."

JFNA president and CEO Jerry Silverman said in the organization's statement that it's "a fundamental Jewish virtue to 'love your fellow as yourself.' We condemn comments that disparage fellow Jews and, in particular, well-established branches of Judaism that represent 80 per cent of North American Jewry."

The Rabbinical Assembly expressed concern over what it called Rabbi Amar's "incendiary language [which] can result in devastating consequences." The RA's statement recalls the 1995 assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who was killed by an Orthodox Jew.

CANADA

Home Started

EDMONTON — Mayor Stephen Mandel joined 200 people June 14 to break ground on Edmonton's first Jewish seniors home. The $30-million building is slated to open in 2014. To be called Beit Horim – Our Parents' Home – it's being built next to Beth Shalom Synagogue on land the shul once owned. The 13-storey home will have 135 units. The Beit Horim Society began fundraising in 1996. It gave $10 million to the project, while the province gave $7 million. A mortgage will cover the rest of the cost, the Edmonton Journal reported.

Hadassah Sells HQ

NEW YORK — Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, has sold its midtown Manhattan headquarters for $71.5 million. The sale was approved by its board May 1, and a contract was signed a month later. Members will be asked to approve the sale at a special meeting in Dallas July 17. The deal gives Hadassah the right to use the building for up to three years. Hadassah, which has 300 members, marks its 100th anniversary in 2012. In late 2010, it returned $45 million it made in the Bernard Madoff ponzi scam. In early 2009, it laid off a quarter of its staff.

Yemeni Jew Buried

JERUSALEM — The body of a Yemenite Jewish leader stabbed to death in an anti-semitic attack was brought to Israel for burial. Aaron Joseph Zindani, 46, was stabbed in a market in the capital Sana'a in May. His Muslim assailant reportedly accused him of casting a spell on and ruining him. Zindani's wife and five children flew with the body.

Wiesel Returns Prize

BUDAPEST — Elie Wiesel has returned Hungary's highest honour because the country honoured a Nazi sympathizer. The Nobel Peace Prize winner repudiated the Order of Merit, Grand Cross, in a letter to the speaker of Hungary's Parliament published in the weekly Magyar Narancs. Wiesel, an author and Shoah survivor, received the award in 2004.His action was sparked by the participation of several Hungarian lawmakers in a May 27 memorial event for Jozsef Nyiro, a World War II member of Hungary's parliament who backed Hitler. "Hungarian authorities are encouraging the whitewashing of tragic and criminal episodes in Hungary's past, namely the wartime Hungarian government's involvement in the deportation and murder of hundreds of thousands of its Jewish citizens," Wiesel wrote. "I do not wish to be associated in any way with such activities."

Shchitah Under Review In Poland

Andrzej Seremet

WARSAW — Poland's attorney general has asked the country's Constitutional Court to investigate the constitutionality of ritual slaughter.

Andrzej Seremet said he believes the minister of agriculture, who allowed an exemption to Polish law to accommodate ritual slaughter, violated the constitution.

Polish law requires animals to be stunned before slaughter. The only exception is ritual slaughter. Islamic and Jewish law require animals to be conscious when slaughtered.

The Polish ministry of agriculture authorized ritual slaughter several years ago, but animal rights activists say a Polish animal protection law forbids it. Activists who had been protesting against shchitah last month asked the country's prosecutor to investigate whether the ministry is violating the law by allowing it.

The chief rabbi of Poland, Rabbi Michael Schudrich, said he trusts Poland's legal system. "We are convinced that the Constitutional Court shall consider the matter also in the context of the freedom of religion."

Earlier in June, the Dutch government signed a deal with Jewish and Muslim leaders to allow ritual slaughter after parliament passed a law forbidding it.

Survivors celebrate their prom decades later

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

It was better late than never when almost 300 Holocaust survivors celebrated their prom last week along with more than 100 young adults.

Chaired by Elise Kayfetz and Sara Lefton, the Senior Prom: An Intergenerational Celebration of Life, was held June 20 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

The evening featured a beauty bar where survivors could have makeup applied, prom pictures against a special backdrop, a four-course dinner by Uptown Catering, a raffle with prizes, music by the Joe Star Band and Yiddish singer Mitch Smolkin, and dancing.

The event was presented by the Yellow Rose Project and supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Community Connect, Baycrest, Circle of Care, Bernard Betel, the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, Jewish Family and Child Services, March of the Living and JUMP.

The Yellow Rose Project helps promote intergenerational relationships between Holocaust survivors and young adults, ages 16 to 40, through programs such as the Senior Prom.

[Cara Edell photo]

Other programs include young professionals visiting survivors one on one, young people calling survivors on the phone, and small groups of young adults meeting with survivors so they can pass on their stories.

Kayfetz and her friend Andrea Rowan first created the prom experience in 2005 for residents of Shalom Village, a seniors home in Hamilton, Ont. Kayfetz, who is also a gerontologist, held a second one in 2007 at Baycrest.

"The prom is now an annual event that gives survivors the chance to get dressed up and dance the night away with younger generations," Lefton said.

"So many Holocaust survivors did not have a chance to enjoy large parts of their youth and certainly did not have a chance to go to their senior prom or high school dance. The Senior Prom is an opportunity for them to step back in time and experience the innocence of youth."

Building Jerusalem (4)

From the editor's desk...

In ancient times, it was the road from Jerusalem to the port of Joppa, as the Romans called it, or Yaffo as it was known by the Jews. Today it is one of the iconic streets in the Jewish capital. A light rail train was recently installed on it to diminish the flow of vehicular traffic heading into downtown Jerusalem. Because of its prominent place in the psyche of Jerusalem, most of the suicide bombers who struck Jerusalem during the second intifadah did so somewhere on that street.

The street is Rehov Yaffo.

Not sarcastically, but quite reverentially, it has been called "the spine of Jerusalem, of the Jewish people, of the world" by a man who has made the well-being of that "spine" and the well-being of the countless men and women who are supported by its supplety and strength, his life's devotion.

It is easy to imagine Uri Amedi as a biblical prophet. One need only change his manner of dress. For he looks the way one might see a prophet in our mind, with a stern countenance but tender eyes. He is guided by the values and the traditions of the Jewish people. He speaks with the calm, thoughtful gravamen of a philosopher. And he is single minded in his preoccupation for the well-being of the city of Jerusalem and its vastly diverse people.

The CJN met with Amedi last month at his office in the community council of Lev Ha'ir (the city centre). He is the director of the council.

Amedi has lived in Jerusalem all his life. For more than 40 years he has been a community worker, organizer, activist, social worker, healer of wounded honour, dissipater of inter-ethnic tensions and mediator between quarreling sides. The last 30 of those years, he has focused his efforts in lev ha'ir (the city centre).

He knows its alleyways, its playgrounds, its public spaces and its hidden backstreets. He knows where people stroll and where people hide. He knows what shines in the city's sun and what lies only in shadow, what hums from constant use and what has been cast aside, neglected, broken, needing repair, needing attention.

But, just as humanity's problems do not stop at the artificial boundaries between neighbourhoods, neither does Amedi's work. He is involved in many different neighbourhoods all along the spine of the city that he loves so very much, where services need upgrading and residents need strengthening. Thus he is often seen strolling the streets of Nahlaot, the storied open-air market of Machane Yehuda, further east and south through the city centre to Morasha and even in Silwan in east Jerusalem.

"Every day I ask myself if I am worthy to live in Jerusalem," Amedi told The CJN. That is the starting point of his sense of duty toward the people who live in the city. And such is his reverence for the city.

Some 800,000 people live in Jerusalem. Nearly one third of the population (30 per cent) is haredi; 19 per cent are Arabs; and 51 per cent are everyone else. They are all his concerns if not actually his clients.

And his key purpose, he reiterated over and over again, is to help improve their lives.

One particular example he recited was in the restoration and restructuring of Machane Yehuda. Once it was a disorganized, decrepit, unkempt, but colourful replica of a medieval Middle East bazaar. Today it is a still colourful, but efficiently run, clean, modern incarnation of a Middle East bazaar. As part of the market's restructuring, he established a vendors' council and he took under his wing the young Arab boys, some as young as eight years old, who had left school to work in the market. They were called the children-of-the-baskets in reference to the heavy bags and parcels of merchandise they would carry to and from the market countless times a day. Amedi organized them into a guild-like grouping, providing them opportunities for education and a minimum standard of payment even as they chose to continue working rather than going to school.

Uri Amedi

"Building Jerusalem is hard work," he told The CJN. "Two qualities in particular are required: "Wisdom that flows from experience, and chesed - the desire to help the next individual. Our behaviour determines everything," Amedi said.

The Jerusalem Foundation agrees with him. That is why it assists Amedi in his unflagging work by providing him with the resources and the encouragement that are at least a start and often much more in his determination to build the city and its people.

Speakers expose dangers of 'lawfare'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Lawfare Project defines "lawfare" as "the use of law as a weapon of war."

Canadian Brooke Goldstein, director of the New York-based Lawfare Project, says that in distinguishing a legitimate lawsuit from lawfare, you must look at the intention behind the legal action.

Brooke Goldstein

"Is it to pursue justice, to apply the law in the interests of freedom and democracy, or is the intent to undermine the very system of laws being manipulated?"

For Goldstein, it's clearly the latter, and in a recent speaking engagement before 75 people at the Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP), she outlined several instances where lawfare was used to subvert western constitutional principles.

The state of Kentucky, for one, is being sued for considering a law that places the constitutional rights of its citizens above the requirements of foreign law. In another case, the International Court of Justice, in ruling Israel's security fence is a violation of international law, refused to hear evidence of its effectiveness in preventing terrorist attacks or accept the testimony of victims of terror. And at the United Nations Human Rights Council, a resolution was passed declaring blasphemy of Islam a violation of international law.

Law cases have been launched to chill critics of Islamic extremism, she suggested. Goldstein, 31, along with retired senator Jerry Grafstein, described the dangers of lawfare and outlined steps individuals could take to oppose it. Grafstein said the practice of lawfare "is all about words," and he devoted seven years of his time as a senator to see to passage of a private member's bill that added the words, "suicide bombing," to the Criminal Code definition of terrorism.

By including the term in Canadian domestic law, it sets "a civic standard" and "it compels police and the justice department to do something.

"If you incited suicide bombing in Canada, it's a criminal act," he said.

While a criminal act in Canada, in the Muslim world, it's something children are encouraged to embrace.

State TV and radio stations, educational authorities and many others are, in effect, practising child abuse, convincing children to relish death and murdering others, Goldstein said.

On Palestinian state TV, she said, kids as young as 10 are interviewed and congratulated for saying their greatest aspiration is to become a martyr.

Goldstein said she first felt a disconnect between what she was taught in law school and the reality experienced by Muslim youngsters. She was especially struck by the image of 15-year-old Hussam Abdo, a mentally challenged Palestinian boy wearing explosives, who surrendered to Israeli forces at a checkpoint. He had been recruited by the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, given the equivalent of $20, had his "martyrdom" photo taken, and was driven to a checkpoint near Nablus where he was told to blow himself up among Palestinians waiting there.

The Abdo incident led Goldstein and Alistair Leyland to investigate child abuse in the Palestinian territories and produce a film titled The Making of a Martyr.

Former CJC head named to bench

Compiled by CJN Staff

Edward M. Morgan, a former president of Canadian Jewish Congress, was appointed a judge of the Superior Court of Justice.

In making the appointment to the bench last week, Rob Nicholson, Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, said that Morgan would be replacing Justice A.M.Gans, who elected to become a supernumerary judge as of April 1.

Morgan received a bachelor of arts from Northwestern University in 1976, a bachelor of laws from the University of Toronto in 1984 and a master of laws from Harvard University in 1986.

He was a law clerk to Justice Bertha Wilson of the Supreme Court of Canada in 1984-85. He was admitted to the Bar of Ontario in 1988.

Morgan has been a full professor with the faculty of law at the University of Toronto since 2008, an associate professor from 1998 to 2008, and an assistant professor from 1986 to 1989. He practised with Davies Ward & Beck from 1989 to 1997 and thereafter maintained a litigation practice. His main areas of practice were commercial litigation, constitutional litigation,private international law and human rights law.

Mount Kilimanjaro climb to aid Toronto hospital

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Thirteen fundraisers will climb Mount Kilimanjaro, Africa's highest mountain peak, on Sept. 4, as part of Mount Sinai Hospital's new initiative, Summit for Sinai.

The summit of Kili, as it is known, is at 5,895 metres or 19,340 feet. Each "peak performer" will climb for an area of care at the hospital.

The initiative is the brainchild of Mark Gryfe, president of Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, and David Cynamon, executive chair of K2Pure Solutions and chair of Summit for Sinai.

"The broad range of individuals who were selected to participate needed to meet the goal of raising a significant amount of money and have the determination and passion to withstand the elements associated with the climb. From the base to the peak, there will be major fluctuations in weather and terrain," Cynamon said.

The goal is to net $1 million total for the hospital as a team effort.

Kilimanjaro is one of the largest volcanoes in the world with three main volcanic peaks: Kibo, Mawenzi and Shira. The dormant volcano is located in north-eastern Tanzania, near the border of Kenya. Although the mountain is at three degrees south of the equator, an ice cap covers the crater of Kibo year-round.

There are inherent risks in any mountaineering trip. Reaching the top of Kilimanjaro involves negotiating technically difficult terrain and the need to watch each other closely for the effects of oxygen deprivation with the high altitude.

Climber Corey Mandell, president of Mandell Entertainment Group and owner and director of Camp Timberlane, said that "altitude sickness is the x-factor. Altitude sickness affects everyone differently, and there really is no way of knowing how your body will react."

They will fundraise for areas at the hospital including the Schwartz-Reisman Emergency Centre, the Highest Priority Needs department, the Avery Goldman Special Fund for the neonatal intensive care unit, the thyroid cancer initiative, cancer research, women's and infants' heath, the neonatal intensive care unit and diabetes research.

Two doctors from Mount Sinai Hospital, Dr. Howard Ovens, director of the Schwartz-Reisman Emergency Centre, and Dr. Bjug Borgundvaag, an emergency physician, will also climb Kilimanjaro as part of the team, but they are not fundraising.

Climber Zak Goldman, a partner in the Sterling Park Financial Group, is raising money in memory of his son, Avery.

"The team is making a very large commitment to go and climb a mountain for 10 days, and I think when people hear about that level of dedication, they will step up to donate," Zak Goldman said.

"Climber Jamie Salter, CEO of Authentic Brands Group, lost his brother to cancer, and I, too, have lost family members to cancer, so we are raising money for cancer research at Mount Sinai," Mandell said.

There are six official trekking routes up Kilimanjaro. The one the Sinai climbers will use is the Machame route – it's considered steep but manageable, and the most scenic. It will take seven days to reach the Uhuru Peak – the highest point in Africa. The group will be travelling with the Adventure Consultant's International Expedition Guiding Team.

"Once I reach the top, I intend on being the first person in the world to lay tfillin at the summit of Kilimanjaro," Mandell promised.

The Machame route winds around the skirt of the mountain, slowly gaining altitude and giving the climbers glimpses of the entire south side of the peak. The climbers will go through various climate zones every day, each with unique and different views and highlights.

Climber Derek Frankfort, general manager of Home Lumber Inc., said, "It is the adventure, the physical challenge, the exotic location and being in one of the seven summits of the world that lured me in. However, the crux of the fundraising initiative is to raise money for the hospital, and that just pulled it all together for me."

Sponsors will have an opportunity to log in and view their climber daily via webcam.

On behalf of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, we offer our sincere congratulations to Judy Feld Carr who was recently bestowed with the Presidential Award of Distinction from Israeli President Shimon Peres.

It is an honour she is highly deserving of for her decades of work on behalf of her fellow Jews who suffered in silence for far too long in Syria.

It says in the Talmud, "...whoever saves a life, it is considered as if he saved an entire world". Imagine then, the impact Ms. Feld Carr's courage, strength, and determination have had on the Jewish world, and the world-at-large, by demonstrating that Herculean tasks, against seemingly insurmountable odds, can be accomplished when one has the will to do so.

We thank Ms. Feld Carr for her commitment to tikkun olam and for standing up as a shining example for others to emulate.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE CANADIAN JEWISH COMMUNITY

IF NOT NOW, THEN WHEN?

Now more than ever, there's a need to demonstrate Israel's humanity and its commitment to peace

Shalom Friends,

Like most of you, we care deeply about Israel and want the best for it. To that end, the humanitarian projects of The Canadian Peres Center For Peace can make a difference. They contribute to improving the perception of Israel by enhancing its image.

Our success depends on partnerships with people like you. By investing together, Israelis and Diaspora Jewry can further develop our humanitarian initiatives that influence attitudes to Israel and are positive steps in the quest for peace. Our 'Saving Children' project, a cooperative Israeli/Palestinian venture, and our 'Fellowship Residency Program' for Palestinian doctors, reflect our commitment to help change the narrative for Israelis and Palestinians. They demonstrate how the Peres Center is breaking down cultural barriers and defusing social antagonism.

At The Canadian Peres Center For Peace, we share the belief of our founder, Israeli President Shimon Peres, that a fair, durable peace between Israel and its neighbours is possible. We hope you agree and will join us in our pursuit of this noble goal.

Thank you and shalom.

"When people ask me how I'd like to be remembered in history, my answer is simple: As a man who has saved the life of one child. I can't think of anything more noble and more moving than the idea that I helped save the life of a child. Thousands of Palestinian children have received vital medical care with help from The Peres Center in Israel. Many of these children would have died if they hadn't received such treatment."

Wary times

The Muslim Brotherhood has climbed to the pinnacle of power in Egypt. The party controls nearly half the seats in parliament, and its candidate, Mohammed Morsi, was last Sunday officially declared the country's president.

In the past, Morsi has usually referred to Israel as the "Zionist entity," it being very hard for him to pronounce the actual name of the Jewish state. He was also a founding member of the Muslim Brotherhood's Committee to Fight the Zionist Project. Morsi is a hardcore Islamist. Yet, he is also a shrewd, practical man. Thus, after he was declared the country's president, he vowed to recognize all agreements that Egypt has signed with other countries. This was a clear reference to the peace agreement between Israel and Egypt.

Once the results were made known, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's office issued a welcoming message of sorts to Morsi. "Israel appreciates the democratic process in Egypt and respects its outcome," the statement began. And it continued, "Israel expects continued cooperation with the Egyptian administration on the basis of the peace accord between the two countries, which is in the interest of the two peoples and contributes to regional stability."

The United States congratulated Morsi and the Egyptian people "for this milestone in their transition to democracy." But clearly, the White House, too, is wary, concerned that the natural political and theological tendencies of the Morsi government will add to the exceedingly large changes already stressing the region. The Coptic Christians of Egypt are wary, too. They fear for their freedom of worship. They fear mostly, however, for their lives.

Even though they are reported to have voted for Morsi in preference to the generals' candidate, most of the women of Egypt and the young, secular or moderately religious Egyptians are likely quite wary as well. What will be the extent of their personal and civic rights in a country whose Islamist government has vowed to pass no law that "offends the laws of God"? Former Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak lies dying in a prison hospital. His family is also wary.

The military council is certainly wary. Even though there is not yet a constitution in the country, the interim powers of the president have been diminished and 166 seats still remain to be elected in parliament, the council must be fearful that it will soon entirely lose its grip on the reigns of power.

And though now atop Egypt's pyramid of power, the Muslim Brotherhood itself, are probably very wary, too, not especially sanguine that the generals and the military council will simply step aside to accommodate a democratic process they (and indeed the Brotherhood itself) have always abhorred? These are wary times in Egypt and for the region. The entire world is on watch hoping that the new regime will care for its people as much as it does for its theocratic ideology.

25 years ago in The CJN

Canadian Jewish Congress expressed disappointment at a Supreme Court of Canada decision not to grant Ontario Jewish schools the right to government funding. It had argued that equality provisions in the Charter of Rights require the province to extend funding to Jewish schools if it did so for grades 11 to 13 in Catholic schools, as proposed under Bill C-30. The court ruled 7-0 the Charter doesn't override the 1867 constitutional bargain.

The IOC's duplicity

The column "IOC still rejects Munich remembrance" (June 7), by Lawrence Hart, dealing with the refusal of the International Olmypic Committee (IOC) to hold a memorial service in honour of the Israeli athletes who were murdered at Munich in 1972, is a further illustration of the inherent duplicity of the IOC in pretending to adhere to the spirit of the Olympics, but at the same time bowing to political pressures from those countries that have disagreements with Israel.

The Globe and Mail recently reported that an Algerian athlete refused to compete against an Israeli at the World Cup canoeing regatta in Germany and that likely all Algerian athletes will refuse to participate in the London 2012 Olympics if they are forced to compete against Israelis. This, as the article points out, would be in complete contravention of the Olympic charter and should result in Algeria being thrown out of the Games.

At a previous Olympics, an Iranian athlete refused to compete against an Israeli, and notwithstanding a courageous condemnation by sportscaster Brian Williams, no steps were taken to punish the Iranians. In fact, on his return to Tehran, the Iranian who refused to compete was given a substantial monetary reward for his actions. I call on the head of the Canadian Olympic team to issue a statement of condemnation and for the IOC to state categorically that such acts of antisemitism will not be tolerated at the London Olympics.

Mount Sinai retains kosher kitchen

Mount Sinai has recently received questions about our decision to provide patients with kosher food supplied by the well-established COR-supervised catering services in our community. The Jewish community, which has played such a vital role in the founding and continued leadership of our great hospital, should feel absolutely and unequivocally confident that the high standards of kashrut will continue to be met at Mount Sinai Hospital. Both the Kashruth Council of Canada and I have been engaged in this new approach of providing kosher meals.

Contrary to inaccurate information in the community, Mount Sinai will maintain its kosher kitchen facility for the distribution of catered and sealed trays and, when needed, the Kashruth Council has committed to us that they will provide a mashgiach. Mount Sinai's commitment to the Jewish community is total and complete. We provide additional services such as a Shabbat elevator, a sukkah, Minchah services and more. I know the board, the CEO and the whole Mount Sinai community are committed to quality and maintaining and meeting these and other needs of the Jewish community.

Small archives lose gov't support

I read the article "Archivists denounce federal budget" (June 14), about the scrapping of a federal program that supports small community archives and museums, with great anticipation. As the former director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, I was involved in the creation of the Association of Canadian Jewish Archives and Museums and was very pleased that the institutional members rallied together to support the National Archival Development Program.

There is one error that I wanted to address. The minister of culture's press secretary describes Library and Archives Canada (LAC) as a Crown corporation. He obviously is not very familiar with the ministry, since LAC is not a Crown corporation. I also wanted to note that beyond the loss of grant funds to Jewish heritage institutions, which is indeed significant, these cuts have been a near-fatal blow to the Canadian archival infrastructure – this includes the Canadian Council of Archives and the provincial councils – which support archives across Canada. In turn, the loss of dozens of archival and library jobs within LAC and the termination of most private acquisitions will also have devastating implications. In a recent article in the Globe and Mail, historian Jack Granatstein condemned LAC's decision to abdicate its responsibilities in this area, which is a violation of its mandate, as showing "nothing so much as contempt for the past and, regrettably, for the future as well."

With the largest institutions turning away private collections – even those from provincial or nationally acclaimed leaders and celebrities – who will care for these treasures as the budgets of smaller institutions have drastically been reduced over the last several years and there are no archival grants available anymore? This is something for the community to ponder.

Looking at Israel's strategic situation

Maj.-Gen. Amir Eshel

The Middle East is going through a time of dramatic change. Looking through the lens of national security, this creates many new challenges and unknowns that we have to take into consideration. We have two options: one is to sit on the fence and see what will happen and try to prepare ourselves to address these new challenges. The second is to be proactive to try to have some influence on events, even though Israel's ability to address these changes is limited. The toolbox is not empty, but the tools needed to address the emerging currents are limited.

Iran's Nuclear Aspirations

When we look to the future, the first factor that we have to take into consideration strategically is Iran. We have to look toward Iran's ambitions, aspirations, and its journey to nuclear capability, and the potential of this to create a dramatic change in the Middle East and beyond. Iran's nuclear aspirations are really the leading edge of the whole package. It is easy to understand that a nuclear Iran is going to create a dramatic change in the region, first, by having such a capability and because of the outcome of having that capability. Second, this will create a nuclear arms race in the Middle East, because other countries will try to acquire such a capability. It can create a process that will lead to a global nuclear jungle, because if Iran dared to do it, others will also.

The first lesson certain leaders learned from the Arab Spring is to get nuclear capability and become immune to outside pressure. They consider ousted Libyan leader Muammar Gadhafi to have made a big mistake when he gave up his nuclear program. No one would have dared to use force in dealing with him if he had nuclear capability. No one would have dared to use force against Saddam Hussein in 1991 or 2003 if he would have had a nuclear capability.

Next we have to imagine the behaviour of radical non-state actors under an Iranian nuclear umbrella. They will be more aggressive and will dare to do things that perhaps right now they are not willing to do. After the 2008 Mumbai terrorist attack, a senior Indian military officer replied to our question of why India did nothing when everyone knew who was behind the attack. He said that when the other side has a nuclear capability and a will to use it, you think twice. This means that strategically you are more limited and more restrained, because you do not want to get into that game. Therefore, this will create a dramatic change in Israel's strategic posture, because if we are forced to take action in Gaza or Lebanon when they are under an Iranian nuclear umbrella, it might be different.

Regional Turmoil

From Israel's perspective, the regional turmoil is not a "spring." A year ago our assessment was that these revolutions would be hijacked by others, and this has come true. The picture is not monochromatic, meaning there are opportunities and there are risks, but when we assess all of those, we think the risks for the mid-term and long-term are greater than the opportunities. These revolutions were hijacked by well-organized groups with a solid agenda and ideology, and the dominant tone is Islamist, coloured by the Muslim Brotherhood. This movement has been with us for many years, and some of their beliefs and values are not similar to those shared by other nations. They are pragmatic, and perhaps this creates opportunities, but we have to look at the core issues and, from our point of view, they are not positive, although they're also not completely negative. They have to deal with problems that are enormous, and the difficult issues do not have solutions right now.

What is their ability to address the internal challenges? I am not optimistic. Who is going to solve the economic problems in Egypt? But if they are not solved, the situation there could get worse. The victory of the Muslim Brotherhood is reflected in the whole region. During the next decade, we are going to see a rise in Brotherhood movements throughout the Middle East. Each country is a different case, but we will see their rise among the Palestinians, within Hamas, and in Syria, Jordan, and Turkey. I do not see them creating a new Sunni axis coloured by the Brotherhood, because they are focused on their internal issues right now.

Maj.-Gen. Amir Eshel

However, one country does affect the other. We do not consider Egypt as an enemy. There is co-operation between the IDF and the Egyptian military to face this new situation.

Syria After Assad

We do not know what will happen in Syria the day after President Bashar Assad's regime comes to an end. One thing we do know is that it is not a question of if, but when. There is a possibility that this major player will be removed from the radical axis.

Syria is not coherent like other countries. The Sunnis in Damascus and the Sunnis in Aleppo are different, and then there are the Druze, the Kurds and the Alawis.

One immediate cause for concern is the huge stockpile of strategic chemical and biological weapons capabilities inside Syria, coming mainly from eastern Europe. We do not know who will be in control the day after. What has been and will be transferred to Hezbollah, what will be divided among the factions inside Syria, and what this is going to mean are all major concerns.

On the military level, every component of our national security strategy faces challenges. First, there is the need for deterrence, with countries in the Middle East working to acquire weapons of mass destruction (and some having already acquired them). The growing numbers of surface-to-surface missiles and rockets are another major challenge to our deterrence. Our early-warning capability in the past was meant for a large-scale war. Today, one needs a warning for a single terrorist, and this presents a new strategic situation.

Another component being challenged is Israel's ability to achieve a decisive outcome in any conflict. We have the capability to hit any adversary very hard, but the last rocket may well be fired from the other side. There will be no more knockouts. In future conflicts, we may be exchanging fire until the last minute, and we will not see a white flag being waved. Today, achieving a decisive outcome is not like it used to be, not because it is not decisive, but because the image at the end will be different.

A Security Strategy

Israel is a small country, and our first prime minister's national security strategy was to strive to achieve a decisive outcome in a very short time and to transfer the war to the other side of the border. Now we are facing a campaign that is implemented between the big wars, and it is implemented on a daily basis by others.

Iran is not only fighting Israel, but also others on a daily basis in many dimensions – terror, political, economic. They have the long arm of the paramilitary Quds forces. What are they doing in South America? What are they doing in Nigeria? Iran has aspirations for regional hegemony, and they are working everywhere. There is an ongoing Iranian campaign using terror, as well as economic, legal and political means.

The IDF was built to protect Israel's borders, and we must address this campaign right now. This means being proactive in order to shape the situation and to decrease our enemies' capabilities. We have to deal with the smuggling of huge quantities of arms. It involves an ongoing campaign in which we have been required to change our organization. There are many fronts, not just military, but also political, legal, and economic.

Direct Threats

One of the challenges to Israel's national security strategy is to deal with direct threats. We have seen enormous efforts by our enemies to arm themselves with surface-to-surface missiles and rockets. We are talking about more than 100,000 missiles and rockets, which are now of longer-range and are more lethal and more accurate. There has also been a massive investment in air defences. Even Syria has invested more than $2 billion in air defences over the last few years, because its leaders understand they have a problem with the Israeli Air Force. In addition, huge quantities of anti-tank missiles have gone to terrorist organizations, and these have been fired at yellow Israeli school buses near Gaza. We have to deal with all of this.

The region is unstable. Other countries that have state-of-the-art western technology might change in the future, and we have to take this into consideration as well.

The Palestinian Issue

Unless an agreement with the Palestinians is based on solid security arrangements, it will not last. People tend to think that peace provides security, and that is true, but here in the Middle East, security also provides peace. Any Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement must be protected by a solid security arrangement because of the proximity of the West Bank and Gaza to Israel's heartland, and the exposure of our population to potential threats. The IDF continues to support the PA under the directive of our political leadership. There are many areas of co-operation.

Preparing for the Unknown

In order to prepare for future unknowns, you enhance your core, robust, versatile and flexible capabilities in order to address those challenges that you do not even know about today. More than that, it is crucial to have people who can adapt to new situations. We need to be flexible to change things as we see them emerging.

Call me a proud 'Zionist firebrand'

A blogger on the Maclean's magazine website has deemed me a "Zionist firebrand" – and it was most assuredly not intended as a compliment. "Firebrand" is Canadian for extremist, fanatic, a most non-academic and far too aggressively American combatant in the Middle East wars.

My crime, apparently, was writing a "fiery" defence of a delegation of Canadian comedians who were heckled in east Jerusalem. Their crime, apparently, was mentioning the word "Israel" in front of a group of Palestinians in east Jerusalem.

Gil Troy

The story begins in Toronto, when Mark Breslin, the founder of the Yuk Yuks chain of comedy clubs, decided he wanted to help the Jewish state. "I could write a cheque," he explained to me, "but so could a dentist." He wanted to use his particular skills as a comedian and an entertainment entrepreneur to help Israel.

He therefore decided to lead a delegation of six young talented comedians to Israel on a goodwill tour, which took place in June and was sponsored by Canada's Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs. In the spirit of a good comedian, who knows no boundaries – geographic or verbal – and abhors censorship, when he heard that few comedians play east Jerusalem, he volunteered to bring his troupe there.

The comedians appeared in east Jerusalem on a Friday night and ran into trouble immediately. Within seven seconds, Sam Easton was heckled. In typical comedians' style of acknowledging the site of their gig, Easton, the MC for the evening, had begun by saying, "Man, what a beautiful country. We are having such an incredible time here in Israel."

People hissed and booed. They shouted out "Palestine." At least one person shouted that Israel doesn't deserve to exist. The next comedian, Jean Paul, also was attacked for telling an innocuous joke – what does a polite Israeli magician say? TO-dah! Some westerners in the audience called Jean Paul, a black man, "racist" for making the joke. Some Canadian diplomats attending told Breslin that Israel "stole" Palestinian land.

My supposedly "fiery" response involved chiding the Palestinians for forgetting the Middle East tradition of welcoming strangers and suggesting that this kind of Palestinian intolerance and rudeness made Israeli democracy look good.

The Canadian comedians were innocent non-combatants. We should not become so inured to conflict that we accept the politicization of every evening and every innocent joke. So, yes, if defending these kind comedians, who meant no harm, makes me a "Zionist firebrand," I will wear that designation proudly. And if defending the Jewish state makes me "fiery" and non-academic, I accept those labels too.

But it's worth exploring the underlying subtext here. At work is the delegitimizers' delegitimization of the legitimizers. Part of the systematic strategy to attack Israel, isolate Israel, read Israel out of the community of nations, involves making the very act of defending Israel illegitimate. If any defence of Israel, no matter how innocuous, is labelled extreme, the defence of Israel is undermined. And using the term "Zionist" pejoratively, in a world that increasingly demonizes the movement for Jewish national liberation, makes the attack more dismissive.

These attacks often have a chilling effect, putting defenders on the defensive. If I were untenured, or more sensitive, I might be intimidated – which was the intention. Instead, I wear the attacks as a badge of honour – and call out the attackers for their methods. I am a Zionist – not merely an anti-anti-Zionist. And I make no apologies for my passion, even as I back it up with evidence and reason.

On a deeper level, this incident offered a classic example of the pathologization of Israel. If every trip to Israel becomes controversial, if every conversation about Israel becomes headache-inducing, we lose and the anti-Israel forces win. The true, important, resonant headlines about the comedians' mission to Israel had nothing to do with their rude treatment in east Jerusalem. These comedians loved Israel – they loved the spirituality of Jerusalem, the normalcy of Tel Aviv, the Israelis' indomitable spirit. They laughed and learned from the Dead Sea to Masada, from the ancient tunnels of Jerusalem's Western Walls to the chic shops of Tel Aviv's Kikar Ha'atzmaut.

In short, as the boyish, charming, exuberant Easton said: "Man, what a beautiful country. We are having such an incredible time here in Israel."

So will other visitors, both Jews and non-Jews.

Why I'm marching in the Pride Parade

The other day I was mentioning to someone that I'm marching in Toronto's Pride Parade on July 1, under a City Shul banner. We'll be next to Kulanu, Toronto's Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered social, cultural and educational group. We'll be wearing rainbow kippot knitted by Mayan women in Guatemala.

"But you aren't gay!" the person exclaimed. Right. And I guess if I'm not homeless, I shouldn't march for better conditions for homeless folk. And if I'm not Darfurian I shouldn't march for Darfur. And if I don't eat meat, I shouldn't care about the kosher slaughtering scandal in Postville, Iowa. And if I don't keep kosher, I shouldn't worry when they start talking about outlawing kosher slaughter in Denmark. And if I'm a man, I don't see sexism all around me. And if I'm a Christian, I don't care what they say about Jews – you get the picture.

No, I'm not going to the parade to outshout Queers Against Israeli Apartheid. They may or may not be there, but their presence won't determine whether or why I go. And I'm not going to be politically correct. There are many things about the parade I don't like – the sexual and immodest nature of some of the clothing, the excess, the plastic beads lying around the city for days afterward, the proof of your being "properly PC" if you go. I actually don't even like parades – they're often long, hot, dusty, loud and filled with over-the-top revelry, and I'm not really into crowds. But I'm going, and I'm marching.

I'm marching because as a Jew I support pride in being who you are. So many Jews have no pride in being Jewish. So many Jews are ashamed of their Jewishness, and they let the world's caricatures and ignorance define them. Shame, self-loathing and self-doubt are in the Jew's spiritual vocabulary and lived experience. So "pride" is a Jewish concept I really "get." We champion it for every minority, every oppressed group, every human who feels stripped of his or her selfhood in the light of the vast and strong "other." Yet when it comes to Jews who aren't heterosexual, we suddenly become squeamish.

If pride is an awareness of our own dignity and worth, a deep pleasure from our own and others' achievements, and a delight in who we are and what we do, then I can't help but feel aligned as a Jew.

As Gabrielle Orcha wrote in the Jewish Women's Archive, "At its best, it's inherently part of the Jewish make-up, the feminist fabric, minority's manuscript... for thousands of years systematic attempts have been made to strip us of our pride, and yet, we are here, all of us standing, many of us wearing the mantel of our Jewish identity with: pride."

We Jews have had to reclaim our self-worth time and time again. We too have been closeted, shut out, trying to "pass," expected to assimilate and "fit in," advised to tone it down, change our style, be like everyone else. Our very existence has been a thorn in many sides.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I'm marching because I know what it's like to feel like a thorn.

I'm marching because I remember as a woman what it meant to be told I cannot, should not and must not. I remember breaking glass ceilings so that others would not have to cut their heads. I remember the fear, the surprise, the shock, the anger, the verbal and public dismissals of my personhood and my place in the Jewish community time and time again, and not so very long ago.

I'm marching to say that Jewish life doesn't look just one way or like just one type of person. It's not all mom, dad, 2.2 kids and a dog. We don't all wear shtreimls, and we don't all eat gefilte fish. We aren't all white. We aren't all married. We aren't all successful, middle class businesspeople. We aren't all heterosexual. The Jewish community is as complex as we human beings all are. I'm marching because the Jewish community should – and could – be as vibrant and diverse as this wonderfully diverse city.

I'm marching because it stretches my own envelope, my own comfort zone. And I'm marching because it reminds me that God's image is mysterious and diverse, and doesn't look only like me.

Turkey: a major player in the Middle East

Turkey, the successor state of the Ottoman Empire, was once a comparatively marginal player in the Middle East, placing a premium on cultivating relations with nations outside the region. But in the past decade, in a dramatic shift, Turkey has become a significant power in the Mideast, having upgraded ties with the Arab world and Iran, adopted a more activist approach to the Arab-Israeli conflict and extended its influence into Turkic countries in Central Asia.

"Turkey wants to be a major actor in the old Ottoman lands," explained Sami Kohen, an influential Turkish foreign affairs newspaper columnist.

For decades after the emergence of the pro-western secular Turkish republic in 1923, Turkey, under the leadership of its founding father, Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, largely limited its involvement in Middle Eastern affairs. But since the Justice and Development party's accession to power in 2002, Turkey – a Sunni Muslim state and the sole Islamic member of the NATO alliance – has upgraded relations with countries it once ruled.

Sheldon Kirshner in Ankara

And since the Arab Spring, the rebellions in the Mideast that have toppled a succession of authoritarian Arab regimes, Turkey has been regarded as a model for aspiring Arab democracies thanks to its democratic traditions, thriving economy and growing diplomatic clout.

The revolution in Turkey's foreign policy is driven by a desire to consolidate and expand its $1-trillion economy, promote regional stability and increase its profile in the Middle East. The chief architects of Turkey's new activism in the region are Abdullah Gul, the president, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, the prime minister and Ahmet Davutoglu, the foreign minister.

All three men are members of the Justice and Development party, which is rooted in Turkey's Islamist movement, hews to a conservative social agenda and is dedicated to promoting liberal market policies. Founded 11 years ago, the Justice and Development party has won three consecutive elections since 2002, most recently in 2011.

Until about a century ago, the Ottomans dominated the Middle East, exerting control in such colonial outposts as Palestine, Syria and Iraq. With its catastrophic defeat in World War I, the Ottoman Empire, aligned to Germany, was partitioned by the Allies. Turkey emerged from the smouldering ruins as an independent nation. The new regime jettisoned the caliphate, secularized the nation, appropriated the Latin alphabet and moved closer to Europe.

Turkish governments from the 1920s onward generally looked beyond the Middle East, but in recent years, Turkey has strengthened links with Arab countries, Iran and Central Asian nations ranging from Kazakhstan to Turkmenistan. Of the 30-plus new embassies and consulates Turkey has opened since 2000, more than a dozen have been in Muslim lands. During this period, Turkey's volume of trade with Islamic nations has nearly doubled.

Since his appointment as foreign minister in 2009, Davutoglu, a political scientist by training and Erdogan's former adviser, Turkey has deepened its connections to its old Ottoman clients. Although Davutoglu is associated with the concept of neo-Ottomanism, he denies that Turkey is attempting to rebuild a neo-Ottoman order in the Mideast so as to gain regional hegemony.

"We want good relations with all countries in the Middle East," said a top-level Turkish diplomat in Ankara, Turkey's capital. "But we have no desire to dominate anyone."

In pursuit of its interests, Turkey has sought to create a "zero problems" policy with its neighbours. But since the Middle East is riddled with problems, this policy has not been entirely successful.

Turkey, having supported successful Arab uprisings in Egypt, Tunisia and Libya, has reaped tangible benefits in those countries.

But in Syria, where a bloody revolt threatens to spark a civil war, Turkey's influence has crumbled.

Turkey, having almost gone to war with Syria in the late 1990s over its support of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), renewed ties with Damascus after President Bashar Assad cracked down on the Kurds. Trade relations boomed, Turkey and Syria conducted joint military manoeuvres and Erdogan established close personal bonds with Assad.

But when Assad reneged on a promise to liberalize his totalitarian regime, Turkey openly sided with the Syrian rebels, sheltered thousands of Syrian refugees in tent camps near the border and even threatened armed intervention.

Erdogan has called for "moral intervention" in Syria to end the bloodshed and has predicted that Assad's government will not last. More recently, the Turkish interior minister accused Syria of permitting Kurds to reestablish bases on Syrian territory. On May 30, Turkey expelled Syria's ambassador in Ankara.

Discord between Turkey and Iraq has grown since Ankara allowed Iraq's vice-president, Tariq al-Hashimi, to settle in Istanbul. Hashimi, charged with terrorism, is considered a fugitive by Baghdad.

Turkey has cultivated its relationship with Iran, its largest supplier of natural gas after Russia and one of its most important trading partners. Nearly two years ago, after Turkey became the sole NATO member to host Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad during a visit, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu expressed concern that Turkey was gravitating toward Iran.

Turkey, though, has been critical of Iran's support of Assad, while Iran has castigated Turkey for agreeing to participate in a proposed NATO missile shield program designed to track missiles launched from Iranian territory. Turkey has also upset Tehran by reducing crude oil imports from Iran.

Turkey backs Iran's right to peaceful nuclear energy, but opposes a militarized nuclear program. A few years ago, Turkey and Brazil co-sponsored a plan to outsource Iranian uranium enrichment to a third country, a plan the United States rejected. Turkey has voiced opposition to an Israeli pre-emptive strike on Iran's nuclear facilities.

Turkey's quest for "zero problems" with neighbours has also hit a wall with respect to Israel. Bilateral relations have frayed since the Gaza war in 2008-09 and the storming of the Mavi Marmara, a Turkish vessel that tried to break Israel's naval siege of the Gaza Strip.

Before the latest troubles, Turkey earned Israel's gratitude by mediating four rounds of indirect talks with Syria that took place in 2008. But the Turkish leadership angered Israel by inviting Hamas leaders to Turkey, hoping to moderate its policy, and by supporting the Palestinian Authority's unilateral gambit for United Nations recognition of Palestinian statehood.

Although Turkey was the first Muslim state to extend recognition to Israel, Turkey voted against the 1947 UN Palestine partition plan and has since been a keen supporter of the Palestinian cause.

Yet Turkey firmly opposes Palestinian terrorism. As a Turkish official said, "Our message is clear. We reject violence, and dialogue must be the way to settle problems."

Stashover-Slipia honours innovative leader

Educator has been running services for 30 years

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Jack Lipinsky has been leading services at the Stashover-Slipia Congregation for 30 years, a job he says he fell into.

He was honoured by the shul on June 17 at an afternoon program, where he was presented with the Ontario Historical Society's Joseph Brant Award.

Thirty years ago, Lipinsky – now a 55-year-old historian, author and educator – was at a service at Adath Israel Congregation when he was invited to read Torah at the Stashover by another minyan-goer. He hadn't heard of the small shul, located on Sultana Avenue just off Bathurst Street south of Wilson Avenue. "It may as well have been Mars, for all I knew."

After his first Shabbat there, he was told, "You're hired."

In time, he was asked to lead services, and his role continued to evolve.

He remembers suggesting that someone ought to say a few words about the Torah reading, and one of the regulars told him, "Fine, go up there." The feedback he received, to the best of his recollection, was: "That's pretty good. You can start doing that, too."

A teacher at Robbins Hebrew Academy, Lipinsky, who is married with three grown children, is also an award-winning textbook author. Explaining how he juggles all his responsibilities, he said he sleeps only five hours a night.

Jack Lipinsky

As well, he added, he becomes bored if he's not doing something intellectually interesting. In 2003, he received his PhD in history from the University of Toronto, and he's planning to work on another book this summer, about Jewish farmers in Ontario after World War II.

"I do what I do because I find certain things in life are pleasurable to me, and I believe they can be made more pleasurable to other people."

About four years ago, after consultation with members, he and the Stashover board instituted changes in the Saturday morning service, which has mixed seating but uses an Orthodox prayer book.

Now, women are permitted to have aliyot, and the service is shorter. It's preceded by coffee and rugelach, and is followed by lunch and an interactive Torah class. Typically, about two dozen people attend.

Lipinsky believes the changes, particularly the pre- and post-service programs, have helped enhance the shul's sense of community.

The synagogue has about 115 member units, up an estimated 10 to 15 per cent in the last few years, he said.

Jay Safer, president of the congregation, told The CJN that Lipinsky has "helped the Stashover thrive over the years by listening to people, being a continuous learner, and wanting to share what he's learned."

The Saturday learning sessions sometimes run longer than expected because people don't want to leave, Safer added. He said Lipinsky is non-judgmental and has "a tremendous knowledge base."

Earlier this year, in January, Lipinsky officiated at the wedding of Safer's son – yet another expansion of his role. Both bride and groom had a connection to Lipinsky as former students.

Over the years, the average age of Stashover congregants has dropped, as an increasing number of original members passed away. This year, Lipinsky said, the shul held two children's programs – one at Passover and one at Shavuot. Fifteen children attended one, while 18 were at the other.

Lipinsky describes both himself and the shul as "traditional," but also favours the term "intelligent Judaism" to describe the Stashover's approach.

"It means that one has to understand what one observes... and stay away from rote observance, which is why we do so much learning."

However, he noted, both as an educator and in his work at the shul, he believes that "observance seems to be in the end what determines continuity.

"So I want people to feel shul is a community and a place they can feel totally comfortable. People have to feel that what they're doing is accessible and speaks to the heart and to the head."

Kulanu calls for support for Pride

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Toronto's main Jewish gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered organization, Kulanu Toronto, is asking the community to come march with it during the July 1 Pride Parade.

Justine Apple, Kulanu's executive director, said she's looking forward to celebrating the city's cultural diversity and bringing more joy to the Pride Festival this year.

She said it was time to refocus on the positive aspects of the gay community and let go of the negativity that had surrounded her group's battle to prevent a controversial, anti-Zionist organization from marching in the parade this year.

Kulanu had filed a complaint against Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) on June 8 using Pride Toronto's new dispute resolution process, but it later dropped out of the process, saying the mechanism was inherently biased.

QuAIA didn't participate in Toronto's 2011 Pride Week, bowing to pressure from Pride organizers and the city's gay and lesbian community to ensure that the city's annual grant of nearly $104,000 flowed to the festival after an acrimonious public debate threatened to see the city cut its funding.

Toronto city council has condemned the phrase "Israeli apartheid" and is scheduled to fully review its anti-discrimination policies in September.

Apple said she hopes many people in both the Jewish and non-Jewish communities will come out to support her organization at the parade.

"We would love everyone to join us. After all, we are the daughters, sons, brothers, sisters, mothers, fathers and colleagues to so many," she said. "Gay or straight, we all belong in the colourful mosaic of the Jewish community. We want people to march with us for a positive, hate-free parade."

Apple said she's had confirmation from numerous community organizations that intend to send representatives to march with Kulanu, including the City Shul, Shir Libeinu, Hillel of Greater Toronto, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), and Jewish Family & Child.

Kulanu's booth at the parade will be located at the corner of Church and Gloucester streets, Apple said.

My experience with Ve'ahavta

Michelle Bitran
Intern

I'll start by admitting something that I am truly ashamed of.

When I walked into Avrum Rosensweig's office two weeks ago, and he said, "The truth is, we all ask the question, 'Could it be me?'" I thought to myself, "I never asked myself that question in 23 years – until last night."

Rosensweig was referring to Ve'ahavta's new campaign to help Toronto's homeless. The "Could It Be Me" campaign aims to show people that homelessness is not about the person, but about their circumstances and support system, and that homelessness is something that could happen to anyone.

Rosensweig is the founder and president of Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, a Toronto-based organization dedicated to tzedakah and tikkun olam, or repairing the world, both in the city and abroad.

The night before meeting Rosensweig, I volunteered with Ve'ahavta's Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless (MJRH), a van that drives through Toronto distributing food, drink, clothing and personal hygiene supplies to the city's homeless population. Volunteers, often for the first time, speak to the people they meet on the street.

I had no idea what to expect. The most interaction I'd had with Toronto's homeless was passing by them on the way to class and occasionally offering them some food or coins. I never stopped to talk to a homeless person. I never spent much time thinking about how they ended up on the street.

I certainly never considered that any of them could have once come from a comfortable, loving home like mine.

"People who are poor are empathetic, more so than people who are comfortable," Rosensweig told me, and after what I saw that evening, there was no way I could argue.

While I found myself unable to imagine what it's like curling up under a thin blanket on the concrete courtyard of Toronto's City Hall, the homeless people that I met had a very clear understanding of their neighbours' discomfort.

Time and time again, I watched in surprise as people who didn't know where their next meal would come from refused second helpings of sandwiches or chocolate. Unlike me, they thought of the next person down the street who would need that extra sandwich, maybe more than they did.

"Ask someone who lives on the street about giving and you will get a real dvar Torah," Rosensweig said, and seeing the thoughtfulness with which the people I met treated Ve'ahavta's generosity, I recognized that he was right.

The moment when the "could it be me" message really sank in was close to midnight in the heart of downtown Toronto. I was offering chocolates to two young people under a blanket covered with designs and doodles. The man and woman, who couldn't have been older than me, were funny, bright and sweet – like many people I met that night. But at their age, with their sense of humour, they reminded me of my friends – and I couldn't help but think that their lives might have started off similarly to my own.

I wasn't bold enough to ask about their pasts, but just the possibility that I was right was enough to make me think, "What's the real difference between us? Could I just as easily be the one sleeping outside tonight?"

Ve'ahavta partners with the law firm Torkin Manes for a week each year, and I found that the associates from the firm had their eyes opened in much the same way I did. One, Zoe Kalmanson, said that her experience with the homeless community left her "questioning how these bright, intellectual individuals had fallen through the cracks."

Later, I asked Lauren Gostick, the young community outreach worker who drove the van, about her work. "Homelessness is a human problem – we are all human and responsible for picking up the pieces. I just happen to have made a career out of it," she wrote in an email, explaining that the work she does is not about feeling good but about doing what she can to help.

Ve'ahavta also helps to get the homeless out of their situation in the long term. In fact, Theresa Schrader, a community poverty-relief associate at Ve'ahavta, was homeless for a decade. After winning Ve'ahavta's creative-writing contest, Schrader made the decision to turn her life around, end her addiction to crack and to do something positive for the community.

She went to school for social services, and now works full time at Ve'ahavta, where she founded the Ve'ahavta Street Academy, a program that partners with George Brown College to help the homeless in Toronto gain access to education as a way to end the cycle of poverty.

"I'm very driven by the work that I do because I believe that some of the smartest people in the world live on the street," Schrader said.

For Rosensweig, the work Ve'ahavta does is a way to create justice. A more accurate translation of the Hebrew "tzedakah," which is often loosely translated to "charity," is "justice," he said. "Justice is a way of creating balance in the world," he said, adding that the Torah commands us to help the strangers among us.

Like me, you may never have asked yourself if you could be in the same position as the homeless person you pass in a downtown street. You may even feel that you have nothing to do with them, but as Rosensweig reminded me, "One day you could be the stranger."

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

Among the most interesting portions in the Torah are the upcoming chapters that tell the story of Balak, the Moabite king, and Bilaam, the foreign prophet.

Balak hires Bilaam to curse Israel as they travel through the wilderness. Repeated attempts by Bilaam fail to elicit a curse. After each attempt, Bilaam moves to another mountaintop and tries again to curse Israel's camp, unbeknownst to Israel and Moses.

There is also an extraordinary narrative involving an angel blocking Bilaam's path and Bilaam's donkey who sees the angel. The donkey eventually explains to Bilaam that the angel is causing the donkey to stop. The donkey not only sees the angel, but it can speak in a language Bilaam understands. The sages say this is the same donkey that Abraham used in the binding of Isaac and is the one the Messiah will use when he arrives. Yet despite all the deterrents, Bilaam is entirely committed to his mission: cursing Israel.

In the end, not only is Bilaam unable to curse the Israelites, he issues a beautiful blessing that we use to begin our prayers. "How good are your tents, Jacob, your dwelling places, Israel." Such an ill-intended journey resulted in such a beautiful blessing.

The entire story is very unusual in almost every aspect and detail. But one of the greatest questions raised by the sages and Jewish commentaries isn't about the details, but about the story as a whole. Why is it in the Torah? It deals with a foreign leader commissioning a foreign prophet to do evil to Israel, and yet these plans are thwarted by God and result in a blessing. All of this remains unknown to Israel and Moses, who don't interact with Balak, Bilaam or God throughout. Weren't there hundreds of incidents that happened around the Israelites that they were unaware of? No other such incident is recorded in the Torah, and yet this one is not only recorded, it's rich in detail.

The midrash addresses this question and tells us more about Bilaam. According to the sages, Bilaam was not only a prophet, he was one of the best of the ancient world. According to one midrash, God shared everything with Bilaam, making him an exemplary prophet. In the Torah portion, God and Bilaam disagree about whether or not Bilaam can complete his mission. It's a struggle between human free choice and Divine Will. We're told of this, because it creates perspective for us in our relationships with God and our fellow human beings.

The sages note clearly that we're not the privileged ones of the world. We had a great prophet in Moses who could lead and direct us, and other nations had their great prophets. The example we're shown is Bilaam. He's not a false prophet or a trickster, but a true prophet of God.

Covenant isn't about privilege, but rather about choosing our direction. Bilaam had a tremendous gift of prophecy and misused it. There is potential for spiritual connections and supportive moments all around everyone all the time. The question isn't whether or not God provides opportunities. It's more what we choose to do with them.

The search for David

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

David is one of the great figures in the history of Israel. Both scholars and laymen have been searching for extra-biblical references for David. For the faithful, evidence of David would validate their belief. For scholars, it would help to correlate the textual evidence with the artifacts.

During the first half of the 20th century it seemed that there was an accumulation of archeological evidence supporting the existence of a Davidic and Solomonic golden age in the history of ancient Israel. Much of this evidence was due to William Foxwell (W.F.) Albright and his disciples who were occupying some of the most influential teaching posts in North American universities by the middle of the 20th century. Their influence even extended as far as Israel, where the legendary Yigael Yadin and his father, Eliezer Sukenik, the first head of the Institute of Archaeology of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, were disciples of Albright.

Simply put, Albright believed that the discipline of archeology could provide evidence for the biblical past. Albright began his long and distinguished career just after World War I when he first came to excavate in Israel. He would help to transform the study of archeology with his technique of dating pottery, known as pottery chronology, and correlating it to key historical events.

Obviously, one of the most important historical personages in the history of Israel was David. People such as Yadin claimed to have found evidence of David in some of the sites that they excavated. For example at Megiddo, evidence was found of a level that was attributed to David, and above it, scholars claimed to have found the stables of King Solomon, David's famous son.

At Hazor, an important mound in northern Israel, Yadin believed that he had found a gate built by Solomon. These scholars who believed that the veracity of the Bible could be proved by archaeology have been called maximilists.

But much of what Albright and his disciples, such as Yadin, had discovered, was dismissed by many scholars – called minimilists by some – over the past 40 years. However, the last few decades has slowly seen the pendulum once more begin to swing in the direction of the maximilists, thanks to some spectacular new discoveries.

The most important of these discoveries occurred in 1993 at Tel Dan, in northern Israel, where an inscribed stone was found mentioning the House of David. It was the first time that the name of David was found in an extra-biblical inscription. The inscription is ascribed to the king of Damascus who, although he was an enemy of Israel, recognized the importance of David in founding a royal lineage. Even though it was dated to a century and a half after the reign of David, this discovery was a major blow to the minimalists and helped to resurrect David from the realm of myth to that of a verifiable historical figure.

From despair to rejoicing

Rabbi Howard Morrison

Soon, the Jewish people will commemorate the saddest period of the Jewish calendar, known as the Three Weeks of Distress, beginning with the fast of Shivah Asar b'Tammuz and concluding with the fast of Tisha b'Av.

According to tradition, the Babylonians breached the walls of Jerusalem during the First Temple period on the 17th of Tammuz. Three weeks later, on Tisha b'Av, both the First and Second Temples were destroyed, first by the Babylonians in 586 BCE and the second time by the Romans in 70 CE.

The Talmud contains a wide array of views explaining the causes of why our Holy Temple was destroyed. Many of the recorded positions posit failings in inter-relationships between Jews and fellow Jews. The most famous rationale offered, although it's not the only one, is called "sinat chinam," baseless self-hatred between Jews and fellow Jews. This particular explanation surrounds the discussion on the events that led to the destruction of our Second Holy Temple.

During the Second Temple period, we know that the Jewish People were divided into many smaller Jewish communites: Pharisees, Saducees, Essenes, Zealots, the Dead Sea sect, etc. Could it be that the sinat chinam between these various communities prevented our ancestors from seeing that they all comprised one Jewish people? If so, one can understand how the Holy Temple and the city of Jerusalem were taken from Jewish sovereignty.

Rabbinic Reflections

How would one assess the state of the Jewish people today? Rabbi Mark Angel, authored an essay, "Two communities – one destiny," that appeared in Ha'aretz on May 23. He wrote that the Jewish People today may be classified as those who do not abide by Halachah, those who abide by it rigidly, and those who abide by Halachah compassionately. He voices his concern that while there are different Jewish communities today, everyone needs to step forward and address the notion that we are all part of one Jewish people.

This month, I am completing my two-year term as president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, which comprises rabbis from different communities in the GTA who recognize that we represent a single Jewish peoplehood. We are extremely grateful to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which has actively supported our efforts. We also thank the Canadian Jewish News for enabling members of the Toronto Board of Rabbis to write their rabbinic reflections over the years.

As we prepare to commemorate the sad season of the Three Weeks, may we all do our best in trying to actualize the expression, "Mi'yagon l'simchah," doing whatever we can as a unified Jewish people consisting of many communities to transform the sadness and despair of this season on our calendar to joy and celebration.

Israeli hopefuls and the Olympics

This year's Israeli delegation is far different from the one the country sent when it first competed in Helsinki in 1952. Then, the most notable achievement was by Yoav Ra'anan, who took ninth place in springboard diving. [http://bit.ly/jolymp40]

Over the next four decades, participating was Israel's main objective. It finally won its first two medals in 1992 in Barcelona, and athletes have brought back at least one medal in each summer game since. [http://bit.ly/jolymp41]

You can see the beaming faces of this year's hopefuls at the Olympic Committee of Israel's official site. [http://bit.ly/jolymp29] Most of the site is in Hebrew, but there are some English pages. [http://bit.ly/jolymp30] Even if you don't speak Hebrew, there are dozens of videos of athletes in action. [http://bit.ly/jolymp31]

The best English website for reading up about the current Israeli team is Wikipedia. Each competitor is listed, and many are linked to their own entries. [http://bit.ly/jolymp32]

Windsurfer Lee Korzits "made history by becoming the first female Israeli world champion at any sport, and the youngest surfer to ever win the world title." In 2009, her career was in jeopardy when she was hit by another surfer and broke two ribs. After rehabilitation, she returned to competition and will represent Israel this summer. [http://bit.ly/jolymp33]

Ariel Ze'evi is back. The three-time European champion won bronze in Athens in 2004 in judo. Watch him take on the competition in some great video at judovision.org. [http://bit.ly/jolymp34]

Last year, Neta Rivkin made history when she became the first Israeli to win a medal at the Rhythmic Gymnastics World Championships. Her reaction: "Words cannot describe what I'm feeling and my joy. I have a powerful desire to bring more achievements to our small and beautiful land." [http://bit.ly/jolymp35]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

And you really have to admire the stamina of Sergy Rikter. The world-class shooter knows how to excel with an air rifle. But when training funds were short, Rikter took matters into his own hands and set up a website to solicit funds to help finance his Olympic dream. [http://bit.ly/jolymp36] Things seem to have worked out since Rikter has been selected for Israel's delegation to London. [http://bit.ly/jolymp42]

Over the years, Israel has won seven medals in three sports: judo, sailing and canoeing. That's not bad, but perhaps if other categories were introduced into the Games, Israelis and Jews everywhere could do even better. Ohr Somayach nominates: kippah Frisbee; the 18-blessing lip-sprint; the clean and jerk Torah lift; underwater shofar blowing. [http://bit.ly/jolymp38]

And if Stuart Spector had his way, Jewish events would include:

• Balance beam: The accountant or bookkeeper who balances my mother's chequebook in the shortest time will be declared winner.

• Oyga vault: A sound-enhanced pole-vault competition, in which the vaulter gains extra points for exclaiming, "Oy, such tsuris this is causing me!"

And my favourite competition, naches shlep – proud bubbies and zaides have two minutes to boast about their grandchildren. [http://bit.ly/jolymp39]

Sinai lawlessness is a growing concern

Recently, much of the international media have understandably focused on Egypt's uncertain political future, in light of the Egyptian military's assertion of its authority after the second round of presidential elections. However, relatively little attention has been paid to the growing lawlessness in the country's Sinai Peninsula. Yet a great deal is at stake there.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Sinai has certainly deteriorated post-Mubarak, but it's wrong to assume that conditions were tame prior to his fall. As Tim Whewell of the BBC noted: "In the final years of President [Hosni] Mubarak's regime, Sinai was the most restive part of Egypt. Policemen were killed in armed clashes with Bedouin as they tried to crack down on the lucrative smuggling routes carrying weapons and building materials into the Gaza Strip, and illegal workers into Israel... There was also anger at the arrest of thousands of Bedouin after a series of bombings between 2004 and 2006 in Sinai's Red Sea resorts that killed 130 people. The Bedouin have said they were falsely implicated."

While the Sinai has long been home to contentious tribalism, the situation is taking on a whole new dimension. The concern, Whewell stated, is that conditions "will escalate because the peninsula is more awash with arms than ever, and because the police – driven from the streets in much of north Sinai during the revolution – are unable or unwilling to intervene."

The Sinai, three times the size of Israel, is home to about 430,000 people, of whom 300,000 are Bedouin. Since the 1979 peace agreement, which included demilitarization of most of the peninsula, Israel and Egypt have saved tens of billions in military expenditures. The 240-kilometre Israel-Sinai border remained mostly unprotected over the past 30 years.

However, following last August's terrorist attack across the southern Sinai into Israel (which killed eight Israelis and wounded 31), Israel decided to build a sophisticated fence along the entire border at considerable cost. The IDF has also needed to substantially beef up its forces in this sector to manage the growing threat. As seasoned Middle East analyst Jim Lederman notes: "The Israeli army has now created its first new infantry brigade in 20 years."

In recent years, the Bedouin have made a fortune smuggling arms, mostly from the Sudan, into Gaza through tunnels at the Egypt-Gaza town of Rafah. To the frustration of Israeli police, the Bedouin have also been involved in moving drugs, prostitutes, and African migrants into Israel. Such lucrative activities have been substantially impaired by Israel's construction of the fence – which poses a direct threat to the criminal livelihood of Bedouin gangs.

To compound the situation, Lederman observes, increasingly "Egyptian Salafists, affiliates of Palestinian Islamist organizations (Hamas, Islamic Jihad, etc.) and even Hezbollah have made efforts to convert the Bedouin tribes into active allies."

The radicalization of the Bedouin, especially young people, who have been involved the repeated detonation of the Egyptian natural gas pipeline to Israel, is a worrisome development.

No less a concern is the stationing of long-range rockets in the Sinai, some of which have already been fired into Israel. In placing missiles on Egyptian soil, terror leaders believe Israel will be far less inclined to attack such sites (as the IDF does in Gaza) out of concern for Israeli-Egyptian relations.

Perhaps most troubling is the introduction into the Sinai of outside Jihadists, including elements of Al Qaeda. Indeed, it was an affiliate of the world's most infamous terror group that claimed responsibility this month for another cross-border attack that killed an Israeli-Arab construction worker. Alarmingly, two of the attackers (killed by the IDF) were reportedly from Pakistan and Saudi Arabia.

This is Egypt's concern, not just Israel's.

Eli Shaked, former Israeli ambassador to Cairo, best summarized the issue, as quoted in the New York Times on June 19: "It is a clear interest of any Egyptian president [even one from the Muslim Brotherhood] to stop Sinai from becoming a launching ground for Al Qaeda-inspired groups or Islamic Jihad."

L'hitraot to the teacher feature

By Frances Kraft

Seven years ago, in August 2005, The CJN published its first "teacher feature," a monthly column that ran during the school year, profiling teachers in Jewish schools.

The column ran with the tagline "They are our teachers..." but in the office, we always referred to it as the teacher feature.

The objective was to honour teachers, because of the important role they play in their students' lives.

We looked for teachers who were not only making a positive difference, but whose personal stories and/or classroom techniques would make for an interesting read.

This month, we wrap up the series with a guest column by Keren Henderson, whose mother, Yaffa Edenson, is retiring from Holy Blossom Temple after a 50-year career as an educator.

Henderson's article can be found at cjnews.com

Corrections

The article "Fashion show raises $50,000 for seniors" (June 21) contained incorrect information. The funds raised will go to Healthy @ Home, an initiative funded by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto that provides programming for seniors in apartment buildings on Bathurst Street. The CJN regrets the error.

In the article "Steinbergs give $12 M to North York General" (June 21), we should have said that Charlotte Steinberg is from Brockville, Ont., and is 77 years old. The CJN regrets the errors.

Toronto teen makes a slam dunk for Israel

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Hallie Rodney was determined to make her bat mitzvah a slam dunk. The 12-year-old competitive basketball player didn't just want to do that with a big party, she wanted to make a real difference.

"I think that it's really important to give back to people who have less than us," said Hallie, who raised more than $3,000 through a basketball tournament she organized as an "honourable baller" with Hoops 4 Israel.

Hoops 4 Israel works with the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to help the vulnerable communities living in Bat Yam, Israel, and in Toronto. This year, the funds are going toward four programs that help underprivileged Jewish youths and communities: the Zipori Educational Warm House, Living Bridge Partnership, Centre Camp Scholarship Fund and JCC Chai Sports Scholarship Fund.

The June 17 tournament in Thornhill, Ont., brought out 34 children who played to the sounds of Sole Power DJ entertainment. Federation provided giveaway bags for the children, B'nai Brith donated trophies, and Hallie's grandparents helped to organize the tournament and referee the games.

"I wanted to make it fun," Hallie said of the idea to raise money through sports. She far exceeded her initial goal of raising $2,500. "I feel like I've made a difference," she said.

For Hallie's parents, Jordan and Julie, it was important that her bat mitzvah be about the Jewish value of tzedakah. They were thrilled that Hallie took the initiative to fundraise for an important cause. "She really loves it, she wants to be doing it," her mother said. "We're really proud that she's a role model for other kids."

Hallie, the eldest of three kids, hopes that both her friends and her younger siblings, Mitchell, 9, and Layla, 5, will be inspired to contribute to the Jewish community as well. In fact, Mitchell is already in awe of his big sister's example. "I'm really proud of my sister," he told The CJN in a phone interview.

"I 100 per cent hope that my friends will follow," Hallie said, adding that she feels it's very important "to give back to our community."

Hallie and her family plan to make the fundraising basketball tournament an annual event and to grow it in the coming years.

For the bat mitzvah girl, this tournament was not just an opportunity to raise money for charity, but also a learning experience about what can be done when people work together for an important cause. She said: "If everyone pitches in a little bit, then we can make a huge impact on the world."

MacKay pledged support for Israel, documents say

JTA

Newly released documents reinforce Canada's staunch support for Israel.

Papers cited in a June 19 Canadian Press story quote Defence Minister Peter MacKay as telling Israel's then-top military commander, Maj.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, that "a threat to Israel is a threat to Canada."

Peter MacKay

MacKay's assurances, unearthed by a freedom of information request by a Queen's University researcher, came during a 2011 visit to Israel, where the minister also met with top government leaders.

His statement came a year after Canada's then-junior foreign affairs minister, Peter Kent, told a Toronto publication that "an attack on Israel would be considered an attack on Canada."

Last February, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird said Canada is Israel's staunchest ally in the world, surpassing even the United States in its support.

On several occasions, Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper has voiced the country's unswerving support for the Jewish state.

Canada's military and industrial relationship with Israel has grown enormously. The two countries are negotiating or have signed a series of defence-based agreements over the past few years, details of which have been withheld.

But Paul Dewar, foreign affairs critic for the opposition New Democratic Party, said the Conservatives' one-sided approach to the Middle East will ultimately damage relations with the United States.

"It's fine to say we are friends of Israel and we support Israel. Sign me up, absolutely," said Dewar. "But Canada's role in the world is to be able to talk to people the Americans can't talk to and to go to places where the U.S. can't."

Comments such as MacKay's "have consequences," Dewar said.

MacKay's spokesperson, Jay Paxton, said that the minister "was making a statement of political solidarity with the Israelis and reminding our friends there that they are not facing global security threats alone."

He added that "Canada and Israel share the values of freedom, democracy and the rule of law. Our government has been clear over the past six years that Israel has a right to exist and we respect its ability to defend itself."

Nazi salute in House of Commons?

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A Conservative minister last week accused two Liberal MPs of giving Prime Minister Stephen Harper a Nazi salute in the House of Commons, but the legislators say it never happened.

In a June 18 statement, Minister of Natural Resources Joe Oliver claimed MP Wayne Easter, who represents the riding of Malpeque in PEI, and Vancouver Centre MP Hedy Fry made the gesture on June 14 in Parliament.

Oliver, who is Jewish, said he didn't initially come forward publicly with his complaint "as a matter of courtesy, because their gesture followed a very long day of votes," he said.

"Also, I did not mention the Liberal Party by name, since I did not believe then and do not believe now that their behaviour would be acceptable to the members of that party, and in particular its interim leader [Bob Rae], nor indeed to any party in the House."

Both Easter and Fry deny ever giving the salute and said they were insulted by Oliver's accusation. "I never gave a Nazi salute in my life," Easter said in a telephone interview. "The thing that bugs me the most is being falsely accused. It's a case of seeing something one didn't see."

What complicates the matter for him, Easter added, is that he considers Oliver a "wonderful" guy and believes he wouldn't say something so controversial unless he truly believed he saw it happen.

Easter said he's worked with Jewish groups for years and that in 2002, he put Hamas on the list of outlawed terrorist groups in Canada when he was solicitor general.

Fry was more outraged in her comments.

"Let me be absolutely clear: I did not make the gesture attributed to me by [Oliver]," she wrote in an email.

"This gesture represents such a heinous era in our global history and carries such painful memories for so many people that I am appalled and saddened that the minister would accuse of me of such an act."

She said she's fought "passionately" against hate, anti-semitism and bigotry throughout her career and has worked closely with Canadian Jewish Congress in the past to "combat all forms of antisemitism and neo-Nazi activity."

Requests to Oliver for further comment or clarification were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

In related news, Papineau Liberal MP Justin Trudeau tweeted June 15 that he felt Harper and the Conservative Party don't "believe in 'tikkun olam.'"

The comment prompted Conservative MP for York Centre Mark Adler to rise in the House on June 19 and condemn Trudeau's statement.

"On this side of the House, under the leadership of this prime minister, this government acts everyday to uphold the Canadian values of freedom, human rights, democracy and the rule of law," Adler said. "Furthermore, considering the many awards and accolades that [Harper] has received from the Jewish community and other humanitarian organizations, I find this statement outrageous."

Adler and Oliver are two of the three Jewish MPs in Parliament. Liberal Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler is the third.

Many survivors live in isolation

Kayfetz said many survivors who attend the prom live in isolation. "It's important for them to know we care about them. Holocaust survivors are getting older and passing away, so while they're here, not only should we be dancing with them, we also need to remember them and their stories."

The event gives survivors "the opportunity to celebrate life while spending time with younger generations who will be able to carry their stories on in the future," Lefton said.

"I think that Franka Kon, one of the survivors who attended the prom last year, summarized the meaning of the event to survivors when she said, 'I used to be designated with a yellow star, but now I am celebrated with a yellow rose [her corsage].' This how the Yellow Rose Project got its name."

Sephardi chief slams Reform, Conservative movements

Elias Levy
Staff Reporter

The Reform and Conservative movements "constitute a great danger for Judaism and Israel" and have done "enormous damage in the Jewish Diaspora" through conversion policies that have led to assimilation, Israel's Sephardi chief rabbi told The CJN.

Rabbi Shlomo Amar was the special guest at a June 4 gala organized by the Centre sépharade de Torah in Laval to honour Rabbi David Banon, the founder and spiritual leader of the centre.

In an exclusive interview with The CJN, Rabbi Amar spoke of his admiration for the Jewish community of Montreal, describing it as "a model of unity and solidarity for the entire Jewish People."

Rabbi Amar spoke in Hebrew through an interpreter. The interview took place at the office of the Chief Rabbinate of Quebec, where he was the special guest of Rabbi David Sabbah, Sephardi chief rabbi of Quebec.

Canadian Jewish News: On May 29, the Israeli government officially decided that Reform and Conservative rabbis in Israel will be paid from public funds, as are Orthodox rabbis. What is your opinion of that decision?

Rabbi Shlomo Amar: For Israel, the problem of the Reform and Conservative movements is unquestionably greater than that of the Palestinians or the repeal of the Tal Law [which allows full-time yeshiva students to defer national service]. We should not delude ourselves. The Reform and Conservative movements constitute a great danger for Judaism and Israel. These movements have done enormous damage in the Jewish Diaspora. The very harmful conversion policies practised by the Reform and Conservative movements have led to the assimilation of part of the Jewish People.

Rabbi Shlomo Amar

After the Holocaust, there were some 14 million Jewish souls. Today, the number of Jews in the world has decreased to approximately 13 million. The dangerous ideology advocated by the Reform and Conservative movements has greatly contributed to that negative and very alarming tendency.

The two movements are not a religious force in Israel, but they are supported by rich American patrons and have succeeded in gaining political recognition by buying off several Israeli politicians. They are still a small minority, but if the government of Israel doesn't wake up, we will be facing a great danger that seriously risks mortgaging the future of the Jewish People and the people of Israel. We must not underestimate the enormous danger that is weighing down the Jewish People today.

CJN: Doesn't the repeal of the Tal Law by the Knesset next July present a huge challenge to the Orthodox Israeli rabbinic world?

Rabbi Amar: To reach an agreement on this important question, all parties concerned have to sit down around the table to talk and to find a satisfactory and equitable agreement for all Israeli Jews, regardless of their degree of religious practice. We absolutely must find a solution calmly and with mutual respect.

The replacement of this law became important, because the majority of Israelis were absolutely certain that general elections were imminent. Each party sitting in the Knesset wanted to make political capital by using the Tal Law for its own purposes... and it rapidly became a big political and electoral issue. Extreme, very unrealistic positions were firmly defended by politicians who were worried about solidifying potential election platforms. But now that the possibility of new elections has been put off and a national unity government is in charge, we hope that calm will return and we will be able to find an equitable solution to this problem together.

CJN: Some 350,000 Russian olim are not considered Jewish by the Chief Rabbinate of Israel today. Many Israelis believe that the refusal of the Chief Rabbinate to convert these citizens, who have integrated perfectly well into Israeli society, is a deplorable, radical position. How does the Chief Rabbinate of Israel deal with this problem?

Rabbi Amar: Conversion to Judaism is not a political or social question, but a religious one that falls within the realm of Halachah. This is not new. Throughout history, the Jewish People have faced this problem... Conversion to Judaism is a complex question that can't be resolved by waving a magic wand. It's a long, demanding process that requires perseverance and a lot of patience on the part of the non-Jewish person who has chosen to belong to the Jewish religion. It takes time. Conversion to Judaism doesn't mean receiving an honorary title or an Israeli identity card. To be a Jew means to agree to adhere with conviction to a certain number of halachic rules that are thousands of years old.

In Israel today, there are some 300,000 Israeli citizens of Russian origin whose fathers and mothers were not Jewish. Many of them are adults age 30, 35 or 40. We cannot ask them to radically change their way of life by converting to Judaism, a religion that is foreign to them.

What could motivate these Russian Israelis, who already fully enjoy all the civil rights that Israel offers its citizens, to embrace a religion with which they have no affinity? The process for undergoing conversion should have been begun in Russia, not after they made aliyah. Those who really wanted to immigrate to Israel would then have been motivated to convert, with strict respect for Halachah.

Rabbi Amar: This question cannot be resolved except within the framework of Halachah. There is no other way. Quick conversions done on the fly would create divisions among Israelis. In fact, the majority of Israelis would never recognize lame conversions done outside the framework of Halachah. You must understand that a non-Jewish person can't be converted to Judaism in the space of one day or a few days. Conversion is a very demanding process that takes time.

This interview has been edited and condensed. It appears in full in French on cjnews.com. Translation by Carolan Halpern.

Remarks 'totally inappropriate'

It describes Rabbi Amar's subsequent remarks in a letter issued on Israeli government stationery as a "threat to Masorti rabbis' physical safety, not only their personal integrity." The letter, addressed to Israeli rabbis, called for a rally at Rabbi Amar's office on June 26 to stop those "who uproot and destroy Judaism."

Rabbi David Seed of Adath Israel Congregation, a past president of the Rabbinical Assembly's Ontario region, said that Rabbi Amar's comments on the radio show that the chief rabbinate – which he described as an anachronism, "is really out of touch with so much of the Israeli Jewish population... Rather than bringing people closer to Judaism, they have turned people away."

Rabbi Martin Lockshin, one of the few Orthodox rabbis who belongs to the Toronto Board of Rabbis, told The CJN that while he disagrees with many stands taken by Conservative and Reform rabbis, they "have been instrumental in providing strong Jewish identity to many Jews who were not interested in what Orthodox Judaism has to say to them."

He said he thinks Rabbi Amar's characterization of Conservative and Reform rabbis is "totally inappropriate and inaccurate."

Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Montreal's Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation, who is also Orthodox, said the Conservative and Reform movements in Israel "do not pose any threat to Judaism. Their leadership is characterized by wonderful people who are intensely devoted to the future of Jewish life, but who have a different vision of religion."

He said Rabbi Amar's remarks "are an indication of a mindset which reveals an ignorance of what is really motivating young people."

Rabbi Poupko added that the funding of non-Orthodox rabbis in Israel, "while not fully equitable, is a move toward a more equitable position." However, he noted, he would prefer to see no funding of rabbis at all, because he believes religion and politics should be kept separate.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, newly elected president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, said it is "ridiculous, and a distortion of history" to imagine that assimilation is a result of Reform and Conservative Judaism. Rabbi Frydman-Kohl added that he wasn't speaking on behalf of the TBR, which had not taken any position on Rabbi Amar's remarks.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Toronto's Temple Sinai Congregation, who has been following the issues in the Israeli press, is not surprised by Rabbi Amar's comments.

He said he finds it sad that the salaries for non-Orthodox rabbis in Israel have to come from the Ministry of Sport and Culture. "All the other rabbis are funded through the Ministry of Religion," he noted. That discrepancy, Rabbi Dolgin believes, "shows how far we have yet to go."

In an email to The CJN, Rabbi Steven Garten, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Temple Israel and president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis' Canadian region, also criticized Rabbi Amar.

"Reform and Conservative congregations throughout the world bring Jews to Torah and the mitzvot. They reach out to those that Rabbi Amar would leave behind, because they will not affirm his narrow interpretation of Judaism," he said.

"Rather than see Reform or Conservative synagogues or their Rabbis as a challenge to the future of Judaism, one should see that the Orthodox establishment [in] the State of Israel is a danger to Jewish survival."

Rabbi Garten added: "Rabbi Amar does not have a monopoly on holiness... his arguments are not l'shem Shamayim."

Dementia in elderly forces hard choices: doctor

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Tending to elderly patients with dementia is a massive challenge, says Dr. Michael Gordon, medical program director of the palliative care unit at Baycrest.

Gordon, who is also a professor of medicine at the University of Toronto, recently wrote a guide for health-care professionals and families called Late-Stage Dementia, Promoting Comfort, Compassion and Care.

He said that people over age 80 have a one-in-three chance of developing dementia.

"It is a rising tide. The World Health Organization has highlighted the dramatic increase in the number of older people in the population that can expect [to be affected by dementia] in the next few decades."

Everyone in health care deals with older patients, Gordon said, and 20 to 35 per cent have dementia, which will inevitably progress.

He said that medication can't alter dementia, and "patients will ultimately end up needing full-time help. This places an unbelievable demand on the family."

Some families can care for patients themselves, he said, but a large number of patients end up in nursing homes. "Toward the latter part of the disease, there is no communication or self care, and difficult decisions have to be made.

In treating late-stage illness, Gordon said, families must decide whether to trade comfort for modern technology. "There is always [some treatment that will provide] beneficial effects, but at a high price."

Late-stage dementia is like terminal cancer with its stages of progressive deterioration, but family members have difficulty accepting the final stage of dementia in loved ones, he said.

"There seems to be more denial and disbelief about what is happening, or there may be strong cultural and religious obligations to maintain life at all costs. This can complicate matters when it comes to making the best care decisions for a dying loved one and lead to tensions between the patient's family and the medical care team."

"When a person is no longer able to participate in the basic acts of life, they are often sent to a general hospital where they die a disheartening and uncomfortable death," he said.

"Many older people end of dying without [having their symptoms] treated. I have experienced it professionally and personally. It's easy to end up on the wrong end of the health-care system."

To avoid this, he said, families need to make sure they have conversations with their loved ones in order to learn about their values. "For example, 'This is when I want you to stop treatment.'

"Ask them how they feel about getting fed through artificial nutrition and hydration. Who would want that? Most people want comfort, not suffering."

A good time to have the conversation is when something happens to someone else, he said. "Ask your loved one what they would want in the same situation."

Gordon's goal, he said, is to prevent people "from spending their last days on earth in the jaws of medical technology, when the alternative can be comfort, care, and compassion."

Kids helping kids, new model for Herzog Hospital

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital is trying a new way to raise awareness and funds for their cause. The organization hired 13 interns this summer, many of them students, to work together on developing and implementing the latest awareness campaign: The Windows to the World children's art competition.

The competition has Jewish and non-Jewish children from all over Canada submitting their artwork. The top 25 pieces, as judged by an independent panel, will be hung in the new children's respiratory unit of Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem and displayed at a gallery in Toronto.

"It's really Canadian kids helping kids," said Rhonda Wolfond, the project development director for the initiative. This is the first time Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital has run an art competition, and so far, they have more than 8,000 participants signed up. The competition deadline is not until the end of November, and many more kids are expected to enter.

"Everyone wants to participate, so we've had to expand and grow," said Jenna Himelfarb, 21, the student intern who has been spearheading the project since May.

She has helped put together the competition rules and recruit sponsors and participants. It has been a challenging experience, she said, but it has also been educational and rewarding. "I've learned how to work independently, how to be a self-starter," Himelfarb said.

Another student project intern, Ryan Peters, 20, feels that the learning experience of putting together the Windows to the World competition has been invaluable. He said it has reaffirmed his belief in "the power of informal education," as he has been learning on the job.

Peters has spent much of his internship creating a video explaining the competition's rules and goals to show in participating schools, as well as using social media to spread the word.

"They are under tremendous pressure and [they] deal with it incredibly," Lorne Saltzman, the executive director of Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital, said of the young interns.

Himelfarb explained that the children who participate in the competition are asked to make a drawing or painting of one of three topics: "a dazzling dream," "a beautiful place" or "a memorable moment." They are also asked to donate a dollar to the organization along with their submission, but participants won't be denied entry if they are unable to do so.

Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital has partnered with Busatti Home Toronto, a company that produces hand-crafted linens and fabrics, and the Woodbridge Art School, in order to provide prizes for the competition winners, including a year of art lessons. Artworks that aren't chosen as the top 25 still have a chance to be displayed on a poster that will be distributed across Canada, as well as at a gala in March, where the finalists will be announced.

"I think it's a really special project," Himelfarb said, adding that it will allow children in Canada to connect with the children in the Herzog Hospital respiratory unit and to support them.

For Peters, that connection among young people is extremely important, as it often moves them to take action. "This is an awareness project and it's also a youth project, and I think the two are really powerful when you put them together."

Are you drinking enough water

Water is the single most important nutrient we need. We we can only live a few days without it, yet none of us drink enough of it.

How much water do you drink?

During the summer, we sweat more, and the hotter it is outside, the more water we lose. As well, the average adult loses about 10 or more cups of water every day just through natural bodily functions.

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

Thirst is the first sign of dehydration. By the time you realize you're thirsty, you've already lost two per cent of your body weight as sweat.

An easy way to monitor dehydration is the colour of your urine: the darker the colour, the more dehydrated you are. The lighter the colour, the more properly hydrated you are. Clear urine usually means well hydrated. Dark urine usually means dehydration.

Your body is mostly water: blood is 83 per cent water, muscles 73 per cent, bone 22 per cent and fat 35 per cent. That's the equivalent of about 10 to 12 gallons of water in your body.

Water helps your body remove waste, transport nutrients, moisturize skin and keep your temperature normal. It also helps prevent muscle cramping and lubricates the joints throughout your body. When properly hydrated, you can exercise longer and feel less tired. Water helps the blood transport oxygen and other essential nutrients to your cells. Without enough water, your heart has to work harder to pump blood through your body.

Water can also rev up your metabolism. A recent study showed that drinking water can promote weight loss by lowering total caloric intake.

Water is essential in digestion. Dehydration can cause your colon to become dry, making it difficult to pass waste.

Water also helps reduce the risk of kidney stones, because water dilutes the salts and minerals that form solid crystals in your urine. Diluted urine can't form kidney stones.

Dehydration can also cause fine lines and wrinkles in your skin. Water hydrates skin cells, flushing impurities and improving circulation, making your skin look younger. So go ahead: have a drink of water. Your body will thank you for it.

Hansen gets honorary degree from Hebrew University

Rita Poliakov
Special to The CJN

When Rick Hansen found out that he'd be receiving an honorary doctorate from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, he didn't quite believe it.

"I went, 'Really? That's me? Are you sure? Can you verify that?'" said Hansen, founder of the Rick Hansen Foundation and an advocate for those with spinal cord injuries.

Having verified the information, Hansen not only received his doctorate on June 10 with fellow Canadian, international relations expert Janice Gross Stein, he also delivered the convocation address to the university's PhD graduates.

"I was asked to speak on behalf of all the other honorary doctorate and award recipients," he said. "We were all on our journey. I wanted to identify this. There are some elements on our journey where we have to work hard, struggle and emerge through."

This is especially true for Hansen, who lost the ability to walk when he was 15 years old. In 1973, Hansen was involved in a car crash that paralyzed him from the waist down.

Since then, he's become a well-known Paralympic athlete and, most famously, wheeled around the world on his Man in Motion World Tour in 1985.

The athlete travelled 40,000 kilometres through 34 countries to raise awareness and funds for spinal-cord injury research and treatments.

Still determined to do more for those with spinal-cord injuries, Hansen started the Rick Hansen Foundation, which promotes inclusivity for those with disabilities, and continued raising funds and awareness for his cause.

Hansen first got involved with Hebrew University last year, when he signed an agreement with the university's Institute for Medical Research Israel Canada, an initiative that encourages interdisciplinary partnerships between Israeli and Canadian scientists.

The agreement broadened the Rick Hansen Spinal Cord Injury Registry, an international database that collects spinal-cord injury information that may be useful to further clinical treatments. For Hansen, who's looking to work with other Israeli universities, partnering with Israel made sense.

"I think Canada and Israel have so much in common," he said. "Despite our geographic or cultural differences, we can build planks that will connect us and continue to help forge a global society where people are healthy and can live in an inclusive [community]."

Hansen was also impressed with the country's medical researchers and professionals.

"Israel is number 1. It's a tremendous place of learning. They hit way above their weight in their ability to come up with new discoveries in research," he said.

For those with spinal-cord injuries, quality of life could depend on this research.

"Our goal is to encourage research to happen. We want to see that translate to practical interventions," he said.

To reach this goal, it's crucial to involve younger generations, including the PhD students Hansen addressed, he added.

"The graduating students that were there, they've not only achieved their undergrad [degrees], but their doctorates. They've accumulated a significant amount of knowledge and are ready to launch into advanced research," he said.

"Each one of them will need to have that sense of inspiration and that sense of not just finding a job… but finding a meaningful job."

These meaningful jobs could lead to significant changes in all areas of medical research.

"The hope is… there's a chance to be able to make a difference," Hansen said.

For Hansen, the ultimate goal is to reverse injuries like the one he suffered as a teenager.

"[I] talked about one of my greatest hopes. Through the evolution of knowledge and human advancement in places like Hebrew University, perhaps [new research will] lead to a cure for spinal-cord injury, so people could walk again. Or [lead to the] advancement of new technology so a wheelchair would be something you see in a museum," he said.

But even without a cure, Hansen is determined to lead a full and happy life.

"I can't use my legs, but I can still focus on my ability, pursue my hopes and dreams and realize I don't need to be cured in order to be whole as a human being."

Mixed Israeli reaction to Islamist win in Egypt

© Ha'aretz Newspaper Ltd

Israel voiced respect for the Muslim Brotherhood's victory in Egypt's presidential election, calling on the new administration in Cairo to maintain the countries' landmark peace accord.

"Israel appreciates the democratic process in Egypt and respects its outcome," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's office said in a statement after the Brotherhood's candidate, Mohammed Morsi, was declared successor to the U.S.-aligned Hosni Mubarak, who was toppled last year.

"Israel expects continued co-operation with the Egyptian administration on the basis of the peace accord between the two countries, which is in the interest of the two peoples and contributes to regional stability," the statement said.

In his victory speech, Morsi said he carries "a message of peace" to the world and pledged to preserve Egypt's international accords, a reference to the peace deal with Israel.

Israel's appeal to mutual expediency has been its refrain since Mubarak's ouster, which made way for the rise of Islamist movements repressed under his three-decade rule and hostile to the Jewish state, with which Egypt made peace in 1979.

An Israeli official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the Netanyahu government hoped Morsi and the Muslim Brotherhood's parliamentary bloc would put the need to tend to Egypt's ailing economy ahead of any revision of bilateral ties.

U.S. aid to Cairo hinges on keeping the peace with Israel.

"Looks like we were right when we said the Arab Spring would become an Islamic Winter, even though western nations laughed us off at the time," the Israeli official said. But he added that he hoped the Egyptian government would "try to be more 'statesmanly,' by working in the interests of the country."

Mohammed Morsi

Eli Shaked, a former Israeli ambassador to Cairo, told Israel's Army Radio that Morsi's authority would likely be diluted by the powerful Egyptian army, which relies on Washington's defence grants.

Israel Hasson, a lawmaker with the centrist Kadima party who has served as a Netanyahu government envoy to Cairo, said the possibility of already chilly bilateral relations going into a deeper freeze meant Israel had to revive its peace partnership with the Palestinians after months of diplomatic stalemate.

Morsi's win was hailed by Hamas, the Islamist group governing Gaza, which is locked in a power struggle with the West Bank-based, western-backed Palestinian Authority of President Mahmoud Abbas.

"The immediate conclusion to be drawn from this [election] is that the State of Israel and the Palestinian Authority have a common interest in quickly, quickly building a regional coalition," Hasson said.

Meanwhile, one Palestinian was killed on Sunday by celebratory gunfire in the Gaza Strip, as Hamas welcomed Morsi's win, hoping it would advance the Palestinian cause.

Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird issued congratulations to Morsi last weekend and said he hoped the president-elect would work to "fulfil the aspirations of all Egyptians" and quickly work to draft a new constitution "that will enshrine democratic principles and protect the fundamental rights of all Egyptians.

"We will continue to support Egypt's transition to democracy and the Egyptian people's calls for a better, brighter future," Baird said in a statement.

The United States also congratulated Morsi for his "milestone" victory and urged the Muslim Brotherhood leader to form his government carefully and respect the rights of all Egyptians as he takes power.

"We congratulate the Egyptian people for this milestone in their transition to democracy," White House spokesperson Jay Carney said in a statement, calling on the new leader to ensure that Egypt remains "a pillar of regional peace, security and stability."

"We believe that it is important for president-elect Morsi to take steps at this historic time to advance national unity by reaching out to all parties and constituencies in consultations about the formation of a new government," Carney said.

He stressed the need to respect the rights of all Egyptians, including women and religious minorities such as Coptic Christians.

Minister Oliver in Israel

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Natural Resources Minister Joe Oliver was in Israel this week looking to strengthen bilateral energy ties with the Jewish state.

On the heels of recently discovered massive natural gas reservoirs off the coast of Israel in 2010 and another shale oil field just south of Jerusalem – estimated to potentially contain some 250 billion barrels of shale oil – Canada wants to help the Israelis with technology and know-how.

Natural Resources Minister Joe Oliver

Energy sector experts predict the finds could mean energy independence for Israel, which currently imports much of its oil from Russia, Khazakstan and other former Soviet-bloc states.

Oliver, who left for Israel last Friday, was scheduled to meet with "senior Israeli government officials and energy industry executives and discuss the potential for trade and investment between the two countries. He will reinforce Canada's role as a secure energy supplier and promote Canada's commitment to energy diversification and to modernizing major resource project approvals," according to the ministry's website.

Canada is one of the world leaders in the development of shale oil extraction technology.

In a June 22 Financial Post report, Oliver said Canada knows that Israel's energy security "is a critical strategic issue. I think it is for every country, but for them in particular."

A spokesperson for the ministry told The CJN Oliver was holding "high-level" meetings during his visit to Israel.

The minister is scheduled to conduct a media teleconference from Israel today to give more information about the trip.

He returns to Canada on Saturday.

Canada walks out on Ahmadinejad at UN

Compiled by CJN Staff

Canada's delegation to the United Nations environmental summit in Brazil walked out when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad stood to speak last week.

The June 20 protest by the delegation, led by Environment Minister Peter Kent, was in keeping with prior Canadian walkouts on the Iranian regime's president.

Canada has boycotted or walked out on Ahmadinejad at numerous diplomatic events over the last few years, including whenever the Iranian leader has turned up at the UN's annual general assemblies.

Kent told the Vancouver Sun on June 21 that Canada would not listen to a leader of a regime that continues "to pose the most significant threats to global peace and security today."

In related news, the latest round of negotiations over Iran's nuclear program ended with no agreement.

Leaders on both sides said after the talks ended late June 21 that they remained open to further talks, and that technical-level meetings were needed before further high-level negotiations could be held.

The talks between Iran and the "P5+1" world powers – the United States, France, the United Kingdom, Germany, Russia and China – were held in Moscow.

"The expert meeting could provide clear ideas for the talks," Saeed Jalili, Iran's chief negotiator, said.

"Today they [the world powers] are facing a great test in order to obtain the confidence of the Iranian people," he told reporters, the BBC reported.

The lower-level technical meetings are planned for July 3, after new sanctions on Iran are due to take effect.

Iran denies it is enriching uranium for nuclear weapons purposes.

"A deal may be possible on paper, but the gaps between what Iran and the United States want on enrichment and sanctions relief can't be bridged," Aaron David Miller, a former State Department adviser on the Middle East to Democratic and Republican administrations, told Washington Post. "The negotiating process will remain just that because the urgency required for a deal just isn't there from either side."

Rockets fall on southern Israel

JTA

JERUSALEM — Rockets continued to fall on southern Israel despite a truce with Gazan terrorist groups.

The Iron Dome missile defence system intercepted five rockets fired at Ashkelon shortly after the truce, which was mediated by Egypt and went into effect at 8 p.m. Sunday. Several rockets also hit southern Israel on Sunday.

An Israeli man, 50, was seriously injured by shrapnel when a rocket exploded near a factory in Sderot. A school in Sderot also was damaged by rocket fire.

Israel struck several targets in Gaza over the weekend, according to the Israeli military, including a terror cell about to detonate a rocket. Hamas reported that at least three Palestinians were killed in retaliatory attacks over the weekend, including a child and a terrorist.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at the start of the regularly scheduled cabinet meeting on Sunday, said "the IDF is taking strong action against those who are attacking us and it will take even stronger action if need be. Our policy is to use force in order to restore security and quiet to the residents of the south."

At least 150 rockets fired from Gaza have struck southern Israel since the cross-border attacks began last week, the Israel Defence Forces reported.

Peres's conference features eclectic guest list

Uriel Heilman
JTA

JERUSALEM — What do hip-hop mogul Russell Simmons, Google chairman Eric Schmidt, Zionist critic Peter Beinart and Dr. Ruth have in common?

If you're still puzzling over that one, you're not alone. So are the participants at this year's 2012 Israeli Presidential Conference, which featured those four among dozens of other panelists at the confab held this week in Jerusalem.

Titled "Facing Tomorrow," the conference assembled leading entrepreneurs, politicians, academics and Jewish community figures from around the world, and with them a bevy of publicists, journalists and myriad other hangers-on.

There was Dr. Ruth Westheimer, the octogenarian sexologist, opening the conference in a one-on-one, centre-stage discussion with Israeli technology investor and entrepreneur Yossi Vardi. There was Terje Roed-Larsen, the Norwegian UN diplomat who played a key role in the Oslo accords and now heads the International Peace Institute, looking lost in the exhibit hall.

In a corner near the bar, Noam Schalit, father of freed captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, chatted with Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. Stuck in the crowd, Alexander Mashkevich, the Kazakh-Israeli minerals oligarch and one of the conference's benefactors, smiled politely amid a scowling coterie of thuggish men wearing shiny white suits.

It was a conference of bold-faced names without a coherent theme. Some sessions focused on Israel's strategic threats and Jewish identity. Others were about the future of smartphones and cloud computing. A group of neuroscientists led a discussion on how machines can help the brain. Israeli President Shimon Peres, the conference's host, held a public work meeting with the president of Croatia.

Some of the first-timers among the 4,000 or so attendees – an overwhelmingly, but not exclusively, Jewish group – weren't quite sure what to make of it.

"I'm trying to figure out what the conference is even about," said Dov Waxman, a professor from the City University of New York who blogs on the Daily Beast and is writing a book about Jewish politics. "What is the purpose of this? Is it to pontificate about the Jewish future? It's like a shmooze-fest, I think."

Indeed, perhaps more than anything else, the conference, now in its fourth year, aspires to be a sort of Jewish Davos – a gathering where the A-listers of the Jewish world can meet, network, exchange ideas and maybe have a good time. Except unlike the exclusive Davos World Economic Forum, it's a lot easier to get in and there's no registration fee.

The conference is a testament to the star power and vision of Peres. Its $2.7-million price tag is paid for largely by the 88-year-old president's friends and associates, including corporate and philanthropic sponsors, and its theme is something that Israeli politicians, at least, are not known for thinking too much about: the long-term future.

If it is to become a fixture on the annual Jewish conference calendar, the Israeli Presidential Conference will be the only real multidisciplinary one. What other Jewish forum brings together the likes of Cisco's CEO, Israeli singer-songwriter Achinoam Nini (a.k.a. Noa), Henry Kissinger, Paralympics swimmer Keren Leibovitch, Obama administration adviser Dennis Ross, Bank of Israel Governor Stanley Fischer, Quartet Middle East envoy Tony Blair and Israeli filmmaker Joseph Cedar?

Where else can you go from a session in which Cisco chairman John Chambers talks about the future of data on the Internet to a talk by Nobel laureate Daniel Kahneman, a Princeton University psychologist, about the inherent advantage hawks have over doves in political arguments? Or from a discourse by Leon Wieseltier, the literary editor of the New Republic, about the need for Israel to earn the conditional love of American Jews, to one in which Dr. Ruth offers tips about female orgasms?

Woman with tallit detained

Israeli police detained a woman wearing a tallit at the Western Wall and later questioned her for four hours. The woman was participating in a Rosh Chodesh prayer service held monthly at the Wall by the Women of the Wall organization. The woman was approached by police during the service and asked to wear the tallit as a scarf rather than a shawl. The woman complied with the request, according to Women of the Wall. As she left the Western Wall plaza, she was detained by police, who said she returned to wearing the tallit as a shawl, and taken to police headquarters, where she was questioned. Upon her release, she was ordered to stay away from the Wall for seven days. In 2003, Israel's Supreme Court upheld a ban on women wearing tfillin or tallitot, or reading from a Torah scroll at the Wall.

Israel brands itself green

Israel has launched a global television campaign to brand itself as green. The campaign was introduced at the UNConference on Sustainable Development. Through the "Green Israel" initiative, promotional broadcasts on CNN highlight the country as a global leader in desalination and the use of recycled water. "Israel is offering to the world the pioneering green technologies that it has developed," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said. "The goal of the campaign is to the show the world Israel's great abilities in the field of green technology."

Jewish and Israeli apps

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

With mobile devices and other electronic gadgets taking over the world, even the most technology-resistant of us are giving in to the latest toys.

Tablets and e-readers have become widely accepted so quickly. When Apple launched its iPad in 2010, 14.8 million units were sold by the end of the year.

The phenomenon had my brother questioning whether it would be necessary for our toddlers – once they reach grade school – to be taught how to write on paper, or whether they'd be reading from Kindles instead of textbooks.

Of course, with the emergence of iPads, Androids and, most recently, Microsoft's Surface, applications (software designed to entertain, inform, and perform certain tasks) are what keep these devices current, relevant and evolving.

With more than half a million apps available to choose from, there are bound to be a few good Jewish and Israeli ones. Here are just a few of the many that are out there.

Recently, the Israeli Minister of Foreign Affairs Avigdor Liberman announced the launching of a new app called the Tourist Information app.

The idea is that Israeli citizens would receive information about their travel destinations, whether they're travelling for business or pleasure.

The new iPad 3

"I commend the excellent work and co-operation of the Consular Department and the Bureau for Information Technology and Communication Services who developed an application that enables Israeli tourists around the world to utilize the services provided by our diplomatic missions in the countries they visit, and to view all pertinent information regarding the country," Liberman said in a statement.

"This application is not static. It will continue to develop, and this is an additional layer added to other [Ministry of Foreign Affairs] initiatives designed to improve service to the public."

Travelling observant Jews will also benefit from the Shabbat and Jewish Holidays app, which automatically adjusts the candlelighting times of Shabbat and other holidays based on your location. You can also choose to show times for other cities by plugging in the city's name. Chabad.org also provides information for the app on the Jewish holidays and weekly parshiot.

If learning how to read and write Hebrew is an ambition, the Any1 Hebrew app is designed for beginners.

It introduces the characters of the Hebrew alphabet and uses flash-card modules, quizzes and interactive games to help you memorize.

It also provides audio to allow the user to hear the proper pronunciation of each letter, as well as video to show how each letter should be written.

Once you've mastered the Hebrew language, you might be feeling ready for the long list of apps that allow you to study the Torah and Tanach without cracking the spine of a book.

For a complete English translation of the Torah that integrates commentaries from Rashi and Ramban and has a full keyword search, there's I-Torah.

For regular shul-goers, there's another app called I-Torah Blessings that can help you practise for your next aliyah to the Torah. It features Touch-n-Read technology that lets you hear the word as you skim the screen, and you can also record and play back what you've just recited.

People who like to pray in private might enjoy the Pocket iSiddur, which offers every version of the siddur you can think of – although it's probably best to leave your iPad at home on Shabbat and the High Holidays and opt for a good old-fashioned prayer book.

There's only one iPad app that focuses on the Tanach's Nevi'im (Prophets) and Ketuvim (Writings), called iNach. It features English translation, a search option, as well as classic Jewish medieval commentaries.

For those who are more nationalistic than religious, there are a number of apps that appeal to Zionists who are interested in telling Israel's side of the story.

StandWithUs, a non-profit organization dedicated to promoting a pro-Israel narrative, recently developed an app called ShareIsrael that promotes Israel in a positive light.

Michael Dickson, StandWithUs Israel director, said "anti-Israel groups constantly use misinformation on social media to demonize and defame Israel. This app uses Israeli technology to maximize sharing [and] helps people set the record straight via the content they share."

ShareIsrael allows information and images to be shared through Twitter, Facebook and email.

If your interest in Zionism is more superficial, Zionation, developed by the World Zionist Organization, will suffice, as it offers a calendar of important events and significant dates in the history of the State of Israel.

And if you're someone who loves to drop bombs like, "Did you know actor Scarlett Johansson's mom is Jewish?" there's the Jew or Not Jew app.

Although this app was banned in France after a French anti-racism group threatened to sue Apple, it's still available in North America. The developers insist the app is just for fun, allowing users to guess which actors, politicians and other public figures are Jewish and defining their religious background based on whether the celeb has a Jewish mother, a Jewish father or converted to Judaism.

One Great Return Deserves Another

Over 95 percent of Foremost Financial clients investing in our Mortgage Investment Trusts are return clients... and some have been with us for more than 20 years.

Why? Because of an even more important return : the return on their investments. An average annual return of 8% since 2000 to be precise, outperforming the TSX, 10 Year Canada Bonds, Prime Corporate Paper and the Canadian Consumer Price Index in the process.

Much of our success has to do with our diligent approach into establishing a diversified portfolio of first mortgage investments within the GTA. But at the end of the day, it's all about dependable returns.

Toronto Gypsy Girl plants her roots in Massachussets

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Kat Goldman seems to make a habit of disappearing.

A few years after she released her first CD in 2000, aptly titled The Great Disappearing Act, the Toronto singer-songwriter was forced to put aside her music career and plans to move to New York after a car smashed into a north Toronto bakery where she was buying a bagel and pinned her against a wall. She suffered severe injuries.

She resurfaced in 2007 with her critically praised Sing Your Song, and after a year of performing almost weekly in every nook and cranny of Toronto's music scene, she seemingly disappeared again.

Now, Goldman has emerged once again – this time in Cambridge, Mass., where she attends university and where she recorded most of her new CD, Gypsy Girl.

"I had this restless feeling that I had to leave Toronto," Goldman says over the phone from her new home. "Career wise, I was getting to a place where things were getting a bit tired and not very inspiring to me."

Plus, she says, she felt she couldn't fully recover emotionally from the accident unless she moved away.

So, after finding a sublet on Craigslist around three years ago, she drove down to Massachusetts "with my dog, a bag of summer clothes, my guitar and a vacuum cleaner!"

At 39, she enrolled at Boston University and Harvard and started looking for a new identity. "I was looking for a fresh perspective and definitely got one from coming here."

The songs on Gypsy Girl, most of which were written in Cambridge, are reminiscent of Joni Mitchell's Court and Spark era. Musically, the songs are acoustically driven, but backed by a full band, giving them an up-tempo feel. Lyrically, the songs are personal slices of life, confessionals that reflect her restlessness and wandering spirit.

"The record did develop a strong theme," she says. "Before I knew it, every song I was writing was about this restlessness, this feeling that there's more out there for me to explore."

At the same time, she discovered that she was finally becoming grounded in Cambridge. "I'm calling myself the Gypsy Girl, which implies I'll never be tethered to any one place, but I feel like I have really found my place now."

The 11 songs find her exploring how she fits into various situations in life. The song World Away, for instance talks about leaving Toronto and going back to school again in a new country.

"It talks about my confusion as a songwriter and as a new student, and I tried to capture that feeling of being on campus and all the young students walking around with knapsacks and wondering, 'Do I belong to them? Or do I belong to the world of songwriting?'"

Goldman says she feels comfortable writing deeply personal songs. "I think that now that I'm in my 40s I feel a little more confident in what I'm saying and how I'm saying it – with no apologies. I find by being truthful I connect with other people because it rings true with them and becomes universal.

"The record is meant to convey that a person can make a change at any point in their lives, no matter how drastic."

Goldman has been searching out different avenues to showcase her songs, some of which have appeared in TV shows and films. Artists such as American singer Dar Williams and Toronto jazz singer Sophie Milman have expressed interest in recording songs of hers someday.

Kat Goldman

One song she's had particular success with is Annabel from her first CD. It was covered by Winnipeg's Juno and Grammy-nominated folk band The Duhks on their CD Your Daughter and Sons.

Recently, she kept the melody and reworked Annabel's lyrics for Kenny's Song, a song featured during the closing credits of the Showcase TV show Kenny Hotz's Triumph of the Will.

"Kenny Hotz is hilarious. Some newspaper once said he is the funniest Jew in Canada, and it was so brilliant when he asked me to do this song for his show," she says.

Even stranger is that the song's title ended up being the inspiration for a Governor General Award-nominated book by Kathleen Winter.

"That was so weird!" Goldman says. "She e-mailed me and asked if she could use one of my songs as a quote, and I said, 'of course.' Then a couple of years later, I'm at this bookstore at Spadina Village and I see this novel, Annabel, by Kathleen Winter. I opened it up and there was this quote by Kat Goldman, and I realized she had named the book after the song.

"I quickly bought the book and brought it to my parents to show them that I'm not a failure after all!"

Although she's moved from Toronto, Goldman promises she'll still return to perform here on occasion. In April, she launched Gypsy Girl at a sold-out show at Hugh's Room.

"That was one of the most exciting nights of my whole life," she says. "I had this whole band behind me, and it got me thinking that I have to get my travelling band together. I'll always be a performer and will do a couple of dates in Toronto a year – at least."

Gypsy Girl is released through Maple Records and can be purchased at maplemusic.com, Amazon and iTunes. You can find more information and stream her songs on katgoldmanmusic.com.

An edgy Italian-Jewish farce

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Pizza Bagel, one of the offerings at this week's inaugural Italian Contemporary Film Festival, is an edgy Italian-Jewish farce turning on the pitfalls of cross-religious dating.

Joe Mari's short, scheduled to be screened on Sunday, July 1 at 6:30 p.m. at the TIFF Bell Lighthouse theatre, is seriously funny. Tommy (Michael Pillarella), a young Canadian of Italian descent, has invited his Jewish girlfriend, Rebecca (Alona Metzer), to his father's house for supper, and he's a nervous wreck as he anticipates her imminent arrival.

Tommy's father, Dominic (Gina Cafarelli), a gruff restaurateur, is eager to please his son by cooking a first-class meal for Rebecca and her mother. But when Dominic opens his fridge, Tommy is mortified to find a profusion of pork products inside.

"They can't eat pork," he exclaims in exasperation. "They're Jewish!"

No problem, Dominic assures Tommy, saying he will fix things. Tommy proceeds to give him a shopping list of acceptable food he can buy for the occasion. But in a riposte, Dominic admonishes him not to be ashamed of his Italian background.

Gino Cafarelli, rear, and Michael Pillarella in Pizza Bagel

With tensions rising, Pizza Bagel segues to a scene in which Rebecca and her brash mother (Carla Collins) get into a late-model silver BMW for the drive over to Tommy's place.

In preparation for their visit, Dominic has decorated the house with Israeli and Italian flags and soccer motifs. More importantly, he has slapped together a number of suitable dishes, including pizza bagels. The question, of course, is whether the dinner will be a success.

Pizza Bagel, with witty performances from its cast, is a sardonic romp into the perils and joys of intercultural dating.

Actor plays an egg in One in a Million

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

After experiencing the "rush of performing," acting was Shaina Silver-Baird's only logical career choice.

"There were other fields that caught my interest, but nothing else excited and challenged me enough to keep me wanting to go into work every day," she said.

Silver-Baird, 22, is starring in One in a Million at the Randolph Theatre from July 6 to 15. A "micro-musical" written by Ron Fromstein, it's part of the Toronto Fringe Festival.

Silver-Baird's passion for theatre began in high school, when she auditioned for No String's Youth Theatre production of Cinderella at the Harold Green Theatre.

"I found myself in the role of Cinderella. I had no idea what I was doing at first, but by the end of the production I was absolutely addicted to the rush of performing, the intensity of the bonds forged with the team and the theatre itself," she said.

Silver-Baird continued performing throughout high school, but it wasn't until she worked with director Mark Wilson on a production of Cabaret at Toronto Youth Theatre that she decided acting was her calling.

"He was the first director who really challenged me to be honest as an actor. At the end of the production, he encouraged me to enter York University's theatre program, and subsequently the [York] Acting Conservatory, where I spent the next four years."

One in a Million follows the journey of a band of sperm on the quest to reach the one and only egg, Silver-Baird said.

"The catch of course lies in the fact that only one of them will make it. Conflict and hilarity ensue as they fight on, only to find that the one and only egg has two egg handmaidens, who only further complicate the process of natural selection."

Silver-Baird plays Grace, a handmaiden to The Egg. "She's a sweetly naive and romantic young egg, hopelessly excited about the whole event of fertilization and always pining for the distant day that she might become the chosen egg."

Silver-Baird said she's happy to be working on a musical for a change. "Most of the work I've done during and after school has been gritty dark drama, so it'll be nice to... tackle the challenge of a different style."

She's been part of several theatre productions, including Romeo and Juliet (Shakespeare in Action); Macbeth (Shakespeare in Action); Olga (New Voices Festival); Little Crickets (Foundry Theatre/SummerWorks); Program (Theatre 4/4/SummerWorks).

Silver-Baird said three of her roles represent personal turning points for her. "The first is Sally Bowles in Cabaret, because it was the role that made me determined to follow acting as a career path. The second is Scarlett in Lion in the Streets, which I performed during my time in the York Conservatory."

Her role as Scarlett, who has cerebral palsy, marked the first time Silver-Baird played a character that was drastically different from herself. Silver-Baird had to transform herself physically and vocally without detracting from the character's "fierce intelligence and vibrant imaginative life," she said.

"The third role would have to be Juliet... It was such an amazing opportunity to play such an iconic role right after school."

Her role as Grace in One in a Million marks the second time Silver-Baird will be involved in the Toronto Fringe Festival. Last year, she performed in Saved, which was a co-production between Theatre Bassaris and Bound to Create Theatre.

As an emerging actor, Silver-Baird said she is "open to whatever opportunities the future brings," but hopes to perform on some of the major stages in Canada, including at the Stratford and Shaw festivals.

"I would love to be a part of the burgeoning film/TV industry here and establish myself as a creative force in new Canadian grassroots theatre," she added.

While she has a few dream roles, Silver-Baird said playing Anne Frank is at the top of her list. She said she would also love to play Eponine in Les Miserables.

Silver-Baird said her family and friends are very supportive of her career choice. "I remember deciding halfway through Grade 12 that I wanted to study acting and being nervous to break it to my family of very well-educated professionals. But when I broke the news to my mom, she just laughed and asked me what took me so long to realize. She knew before I did what I wanted to do with my life."

There was even a running joke in her class at the York Conservatory that the front two rows were always full of Silver-Baird's family.

Being Jewish has definitely influenced her work, she said. "It's a part of who I am, and as an artist I'm always drawing on myself and my own experiences."

On a more practical level, she said that studying with her bat mitzvah tutor, an accomplished singer, propelled her into the world of music, which in turn led her to theatre.

"My bat mitzvah was akin to my singing voice's coming out party."

Cellist, 15, wins Marta Hidy Prize

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Like many 15-year-old boys, Daniel Hass spends his time biking, reading and listening to music. But unlike most kids his age, he also spends about four hours a day practising cello.

"If I get into it, it's the most fun thing I can do," said Daniel of the hours he spends playing. "It's a lot of hard work, but I feel it's very fulfilling work."

The hours of hard work have certainly been paying off. Daniel recently won the Orchestra Toronto Concerto Competition Marta Hidy Prize, which awarded him a $1,000 scholarship as well as an opportunity to perform as a soloist with Orchestra Toronto at a concert for young people. Orchestra Toronto operates on a volunteer basis and is Canada's largest community orchestra.

In the two short years since moving from Tel Aviv to Toronto with his family, Daniel has already made his mark on the music scene in the city. In 2011, he won first prize in the concerto competition of the Toronto Sinfonietta, as well as at the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra Concerto Competition. The latter honour gives him the opportunity to make his debut with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra next fall.

"It's wonderful," said Daniel's proud father, Kobi Hass, of his son's achievements. "We want our kids to know what they want to do and to pursue it," he added.

Daniel has been surrounded by music his entire life. His father is a professional bass player, and his older siblings play violin and piano. Daniel began playing the cello at four years old, wanting to play what he saw at the

"I thought that everybody played the violin because I heard it so much," said Daniel of growing up in a musical family. He took an immediate liking to the cello, though he has also learned to play the piano.

In Israel, Daniel studied cello with Michael Bezem at the Israel Conservatory of Music, as well as with Zvi Plesser at the Jerusalem Academy of Music. At only eight years old, he became a soloist with the Ashdod Chamber Orchestra. He went on to win national first prize in an Israeli cello competition and later performed with the Israel Camerata Orchestra.

The move to Canada didn't slow Daniel down at all. He is home-schooled, which allows more time for his practising and performing, and has just completed the equivalent of Grade 9. Since 2010, Daniel has been studying with David Hetherington at the Royal Conservatory of Music in the Young Artist Performance Academy. Daniel is also the principal cellist of the conservatory's Academy Chamber Orchestra and of the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra.

In the summers, he attends the Perlman Music Program in New York state, a six-week intensive music program for gifted youths from all over the world.

Even with his many accomplishments, the teenaged cellist remains modest and focused. "I just want to be the best musician I can be," Daniel said, adding that he makes a constant effort to improve his playing. "I always have new goals, and I work hard and try to reach them."

Daniel confessed that before performing he still gets a bit nervous, but once he begins to play, he is able to focus on the music and forget the stage fright. "The moment you start playing, it's a lot easier," he said.

Although he would love to become a professional musician as an adult, he said he's realistic about the challenges that face many talented musicians who wish to make a living from their art. Nevertheless, he plans to give it his best effort and is committed to continue playing the cello into adulthood. "I'm sure that music will always be a part of my life."

DAVID SHORE, CANADIAN-BORN CREATOR OF HOUSE TV SERIES, INKS NEW TV DEAL WORTH MILLIONS

David Shore, the London, Ont.-born writer-director of the television drama House that concluded its eighth and final season in May, has signed a lucrative deal to develop new projects for television.

"The veteran 'showrunner' has inked a new three-year overall deal – said to be in the eight-figure range – with Sony TV," the Hollywood Reporter said on June 7. The 43-year-old Shore worked as a corporate lawyer in the mid-1980s before going to Los Angeles and breaking into television. He and his family now live in Encino, Calif.

In a recent interview, Shore said he was often asked, especially in the early years of House, to provide a succinct description of the show's main character, the eponymous, drug-addicted doctor played by Hugh Laurie. "I would find myself trying to be brief and failing... I was just rambling and not giving any good answers. Then I realized the reason I couldn't do it was because it couldn't be done. When I reach a point when I can describe a character in one paragraph, then the character is no longer interesting."

Author will not authorize Hebrew version of The Color Purple

JTA

JERUSALEM — Alice Walker, author of The Color Purple, has refused to authorize a Hebrew translation of her prize-winning work, citing what she called Israel's "apartheid state."

In a June 9 letter to Yediot Books, Walker said she would not allow an Israeli house to publish the book, because "Israel is guilty of apartheid and persecution of the Palestinian people, both inside Israel and also in the occupied territories."

Alice Walker

In her letter, posted June 17 by the Palestinian Campaign for the Academic and Cultural Boycott of Israel on its website, Walker supported the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement and offered her hope that it "will have enough of an impact on Israeli civilian society to change the situation."

It was not clear when Yediot Books, an imprint of the daily Yediot Achronot newspaper, made the request, or whether Walker could in fact stop translation of the book. At least one version of the book has already appeared in Hebrew translation, in the 1980s.

Walker said Israel's policies were "worse" than the segregation she suffered as an American youth and said South Africans had told her it was worse than apartheid in that country.

The Color Purple, which won the 1983 Pulitzer Prize for Fiction, was adapted into a movie in 1985 directed by Jewish filmmaker Steven Spielberg.

The novel and the film, which was nominated for 11 Oscars, treat racism in the American South in the first part of the 20th century and sexism among blacks.

Walker has intensified her anti-Israel activism in recent years, travelling to the Gaza Strip to advocate on behalf of the Palestinians.

A look at Irving Layton's early '60s efforts

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

In the late 1940s and early '50s, Irving Layton taught at a variety of schools, including Montreal's Herzliah High School. He raised a young family with his wife, the artist Betty Sutherland, and published his own work through the small press and little magazine he founded. Though he drew inspiration and support from a wide literary circle, Layton's early books were self-published and hand-sold one copy at a time.

His career underwent a shift in 1954, when the American poet Robert Creeley, who was based on the island of Mallorca, offered to bring out Layton's collection In the Midst of My Fever. In Creeley, Layton found an editor and international distributor of note who was not part of the closely knit new guard of Montreal poets and critics. Creeley's interest in Layton was matched by the glowing response his poetry received from the American poet William Carlos Williams.

But in the early 1960s everything changed. Layton had found his Canadian publishing home at Toronto-based McClelland and Stewart, where the mercurial management of Jack McClelland aimed to position writing like Layton's at the vanguard of a new Canadian canon.

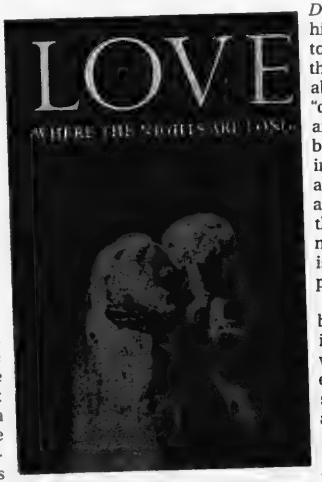
Among the early outcomes of this relationship were a 1961 prose and poetry collection titled The Swinging Flesh, and Love Where the Nights Are Long: An Anthology of Canadian Love Poems, which appeared the following year.

The Swinging Flesh opens with a strident and provocative foreword in which Layton accounts not only for his poetic and philosophical outlook, but opens an attack on targets that remained in his sights for much of his career.

"Philistine senselessness," he writes, "made self-assured by swimming pools and a string of lackeys I find repulsive. And pathetic. The philistine Jew is as depressing as the philistine Arab or the philistine Russian. I do not like his acquisitiveness, his love of show, his moneytheism. Or his hypocrisy and smugness." Included in Layton's list of dislikes are "Anglo-Saxon academics" and a bigger and vaguer target, "bourgeois-Christian civilization."

In now-familiar prophetic tones, he tells his readers that the "society of the future will have no more need for living, creative art than for religion. To the comfortable air-conditioned suburbanite of tomorrow, the intuitions of the one will appear as ludicrously pitiable and archaic as those of the other."

The Swinging Flesh represents an early effort by Layton and his publisher to place him at the forefront of Canadian letters. With Love Where the Nights Are Long, poet and publisher took a further step to redefine the idea of Canadian writing. For book lovers, this volume is an artifact in its own right. Slim, at just 80 pages long, it is a beautiful thing, largely because of its illustrations by the Toronto artist of the moment, Harold Town. These etchings and montages are oblique but erotic, somehow modern and antique in their look, punctuating poems by Layton, Cohen, Alden Nowlan, Louis Dudek, Fred Cogswell, F.R. Scott, Jay Macpherson, Ray Souster, Bliss Carman and others.



Layton's choices are canny, and retain a lightness and lyric intimacy. Many of the best poems in the volume feel as though they were part of a discussion about what a Canadian poem ought to be in the mid-20th century. Emblematic of this discussion is the poem Layton places first in the volume, Leonard Cohen's As the Mist Leaves No Scar. Readers today may hear it with its musical setting from the great, underrated 1977 album Death of a Ladies' Man. But in 1962, when Cohen was not yet 30 years old, it set the tone for an era of poetic innovation.

As the mist leaves no scar
On the dark green hill,
So my body leaves no scar
On you, nor ever will.

Other poets in the collection, now far less attentively discussed than Cohen, were making similarly small and lovely things. Layton, naturally, includes a few of his own. Alden Nowlan's Canadian Love Song is of a piece with Cohen's work.

To my love's bed, to keep her warm,
I'll carry wrapped and heated stones.
That which is comfort to the flesh is sometimes torture to the bones.

Even A.J.M. Smith, a senior figure on the scene, offers something Cohenesque against the unromantic backdrop of Lachine.

There is a sorcerer in Lachine
Who for a small fee will put a spell
On my beloved, who has sea-green
Eyes, and on my doting self as well.

Layton introduces the poetry with one of his bombastic forewords. Under the title What Canadians Don't Know About Love, he informs his readers that poets are best placed to inform Canadians about what they have forgotten or never knew about love. Those who oppose them "can go to hell. So can Mrs. Grundy and her numerous evil-smelling brood of censorious prigs, sniggering boobs, tight-lipped matrons and frustrated nobodies found in all the cities, towns and villages of this land." According to Layton, Canadian culture is a joke; social life is consumed by "the excitement of professional sports and alcohol."

This past March, Layton's 100th birthday was celebrated with readings from Fredericton to Vancouver. But a return to his early '60s efforts is sufficient to refresh our sense of what he made of Canadian literature at the most energetic point in his career.

McClelland and Stewart is now wholly owned by Random House, and early Layton, like The Swinging Flesh and Love Where the Nights Are Long, are out of print. Used copies float about on the Internet. The Texas Book Depot is presently offering a copy for 39 cents plus shipping. Whoever gets there first wins the prize.

Norman Ravvin's recent books are the novel, The Joyful Child (Gaspereau Press), and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein (McGill-Queen's), co-edited with Sherry Simon.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

Island Yacht Club considering merger

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It was almost impossible for Jews to gain entry into gentile yacht clubs 60 years ago.

Recently, the largely Jewish Island Yacht Club (IYC) was approached by the prestigious Royal Canadian Yacht Club (RCYC), with a view to considering a merger or other possible arrangement.

The situation is certainly ironic, acknowledged IYC Commodore David Baskin, but it reflects the way the city of Toronto has changed. The RCYC has Jewish members today, and the IYC has a good number of non-Jewish members.

The IYC has struck a committee to investigate the proposal, and while no decision has yet been made, the offer is being taken quite seriously, Baskin said. There are upsides to a potential merger as well as downsides and the committee might suggest something in between, he suggested.

Interest is certainly high at the RCYC. Reporting online to his members, RCYC Commodore George Meadows said, "No negotiations have taken place. The informal discussion led us to believe there may be mutual benefit to both parties should we be able to reach agreement to get together."

Baskin said the RCYC approach came only a few weeks ago. The IYC has assets that the RCYC might want to utilize, while the RCYC has resources that IYC members could enjoy, he said.

For one, the IYC possesses 30 to 40 unused slips, while the RCYC has plenty of members but nowhere for many of them to dock their boats.

The RCYC, which was founded in 1852 and can boast Prince Phillip as its patron, has run out of slips for the 35-foot-plus boats that sailors today favour. The IYC has spare slips on Muggs Island, only a short ride away from the RCYC's facilities on Centre Island.

A merger or other arrangement would see RCYC sailors berthing their boats at IYC slips and IYC members taking advantage of RCYC facilities.

That could be advantageous for IYC members, who pay dues similar to those levied on RCYC members, but who enjoy the club's facilities from May to September. The RCYC runs year-round, with its club offering dining and health-club facilities at Bloor and St. George streets in Toronto all year round.

A merger would provide IYC members more for their money, Baskin suggested.

As for the downside, "We could lose our independence in a merged situation. They're much bigger than we are. We might lose our identity."

Those are issues the committee will have to consider, he said, adding any decision will have to be approved by a two-thirds vote of the members.

In his address to RCYC members, Meadows stated, "Our club is in good financial shape, but because of the economy we have been losing members. This is similar to other yacht clubs, golf clubs and other private clubs.

"The Island Yacht Club has also suffered the same effects with a number of their members, which could impact on the sustainability of their operation in the future. They have a great facility, with lots of available docks, especially for larger boats. There is a new clubhouse, a swimming pool and tennis courts, all housed in a lovely setting," he stated.

"At first glance there are numerous advantages to such a joining of forces. It is an opportunity worth investigating.

"The investigation may find that some IYC services could be combined with RCYC services (e.g. administration, membership, harbour and property, food and beverage) for cost efficiencies, but these details are not known at this time."

Baskin said timing of a vote is unclear, but if both sides approve a merger, it likely wouldn't be implemented until next year's boating season.

Special Olympian wins four medals at Ontario games

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

His favourite stroke might be the freestyle, but it was in the 200-metre individual medley that Jeffrey Steiman really showed his mettle.

The 22-year-old also earned medals in his favourite stroke, winning silvers in the 100-metre and 50-metre freestyle races. A bronze in the 50-metre backstroke rounded out his medal haul.

Jeffrey Steiman

Roughly 1,000 competitors participated in the Games, which included five- and 10-pin bowling competitions, bocce and basketball.

Jeffrey swims for the North York Eels swim club, his dad, Howard, told The CJN. He's been a swimmer since he was five. The Eels compete in local and regional events two or three times a year, and they take part in the provincial and national competitions, which are held every four years. At the last provincials four years ago, Jeffrey took home four medals, his dad recalled.

Jeffrey trained once a week in preparing for the Ontario Games, spending 2-1/2 hours in the pool. "Like everybody else, he's not that keen on training every week, but when it comes to the competition, he looks forward to it," Howard said. "He loves the accolades and the medals. Jeffrey likes to win, just like any other athlete."

In addition to swimming, Jeffrey enjoys karate and has earned a black belt. He's competed in bowling at other Special Olympics.

He goes "spinning" on a stationary bike with his grandfather once a week, and he does some weight training as well, Howard said.

When he's not competing in sports, Jeffrey has a job packaging bulk items, work he found through the MukiBaum Treatment Centres.

Dress well and feel good, style coaches say

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Whether you're a fashionista who's always dressed to the nines or a schlub who doesn't care whether your flip-flops match your sweatpants, there's one thing we all have in common.

We all have to get dressed in the morning. And style coaches Maytal Oziel and Shayna Lampert say the way you put yourself together matters.

Oziel insists that the effort you put into your look tells the world how you feel about yourself.

Dressing well "shows people that you respect who you are and it gives off an impression. You don't want to go on a job interview looking all dishevelled, you want to be put together. You have to know what goes and what fits your body and how to market yourself so that people want you."

Oziel, 29, a primary school teacher, said she was a teenager working a retail job at Hill Street Blues in Richmond Hill, Ont., when her fashion instincts came to the surface.

"I asked my boss if I could be the buyer of the store. I begged him for a long time to take me buying with them, and they wouldn't because they thought I was too young. As soon as they gave me a chance, the sales at Hill Street went up. People loved what I bought, and the customers were just buying and buying," Oziel said.

"That gave me the confidence to know that I can do this."

She said she was soon offered a buying position at another retail store, Buffalo Jeans, but declined the offer because she wanted to go to teacher's college to get her degree.

SHAYNA LAMPERT

Despite her teaching career, Oziel hasn't given up on her passion. She operates a service on the side called Tash Style and Image Coach (www.tashstyle.com).

"I offer my time to go shopping with you, go into your wardrobe to organize it for you. I can colour coordinte it for you, get rid of stuff that you don't wear anymore," she said.

"I can show you things in your closet that you should be wearing more and how to piece it together... and how to decide what style of clothing you should be wearing to flatter your body."

Thirty-year-old Lampert, who runs a fashion consulting service similar to Oziel's called Dresscode Styling Agency (www.dresscodeagency.com), started her fashion career in 2007 by working on commercial and music-video television shoots for different production companies around Toronto.

Lampert said she can relate to people who just want to be comfortable in their sweatpants all day, but agreed with Oziel that putting yourself together in the morning is more important than some people realize.

"You never know where or with whom you're going to end up at any point in the day," she said, adding that looking your best can alter your mood and boost your confidence.

"If there was a day that I wasn't feeling up to it and didn't want to go to school, my mother would tell me to pick out my favourite outfit, put on makeup, make myself look good and feel good and get my ass to school. That really did make a difference," Lampert said.

"The time that it takes to put on a nice pair of jeans and a white T-shirt is equivalent to the time it would take you to put on sweatpants, but you'll feel more put together and more confident in your daily interactions."

Oziel added that she understands that women who spend their days doting on their families often let their own needs fall by the wayside, but taking pride in the way you look is the least you can do for yourself.

"Even if you're going to the mall with your three kids and husband and you're in sweatpants, you'll feel like crap and show the world you feel like garbage and don't respect yourself," she said.

"It's not about impressing anyone else, but it's about making yourself feel good. When you dress up and look good, you're going to feel good."

Dressing well doesn't mean you have to splurge on designer labels. Finding clothes that fit properly and flatter your frame is enough to modify your look.

"Everything is about fit. You can wear anything you want, as long as it fits properly," Oziel said.

"If you're very busty, don't wear a low-cut shirt tucked into a skirt. You need to let it out so you look like your torso is a little bit longer and you're not all chest."

She said for those who have body types that are hard to fit, tailors can be your best friend.

"If you find jeans that fit you everywhere except the waist, you can cinch in the waist."

Lampert, who obtained a fashion merchandising degree from Seneca College and interned with designers Ian Hilton and Joseph Mimran, pointed out that most people aren't brought up with an education in fashion.

"Your mother may have told you about certain colours clashing, not to wear white after Labour Day – first of all, none of those rules apply anymore, but I've come up with a system of how to teach people to dress. It's a four-point system about how to put yourself together in the morning."

Lampert, who offers daily styling tips through her Twitter account @DresscodeAgency, said she thinks people should veer from wearing too much of the same colour at once.

"They might wear too much neutral or wear two shades of the same colour... One of my rules is to dress in contrasting colours. I'll always leave my clients with a colour wheel to put in their closet so they can see what brightens, and works together and compliments. If you work on the same side of a colour wheel, it can wash you out instead of punch you up."

But for those not interested in following rules, Lampert said she gives credit to people who want to think outside the box when it comes to choosing an outfit.

"Even though they may not get it right every time, at least they're trying," she said.

"If you want to be bold, be bold. Just wear it confidently. If you didn't get it right that time, try again."

Being bold is right on track with this summer's trend of colour blocking, Oziel said.

"Colour blocking – taking two bright colours and putting them together – is very hot for the summer. So it could mean wearing a bright blue shirt with coral shorts. But you have to make sure that your accessories are neutral," said Oziel, who also tweets daily style tips @tash_style.

Although religious women who are concerned with dressing modestly may have a few more restrictions when it comes to shopping for the latest trends, both Oziel and Lampert agree that frum woman can cover up and look chic at the same time.

"They can buy themselves a shell [nylon, long-sleeved shirts], and still go to trendy stores like H&M and buy whatever they want and wear it on top," Oziel said.

Lampert said another option is to wear a sheer, long-sleeved top with a pop of colour underneath.

"Luckily, long skirts are in right now, so that's perfect. This summer, statement necklaces are in, so that's another easy way to punch things up."

Garage sale surprises

"Are you ready to go?" Meir asks me, all excited and giddy. The kids are standing next to him. So is the dog, wagging its tail.

See, I promised them a stroll around the neighbourhood's garage sales, or as we call them – "garbage sales."

It's not that I hate purchasing new shmattes. And I might willingly go to a garage sale in another city or country. It's just that here? In our own backyard?

Last week, Meir proudly handed me a to-die-for vintage lamp, which I had seen in a posh catalogue, while saying the magic words, "A buck fifty!"

So, who am I kidding?

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

"There are some ground rules," I say, as we start strolling. "We don't buy things we don't need. We buy only to-die-for vintage lamps, maybe some decorative statues, floral cushions, toys, furniture, a lawn mower, bicycles and an aquarium. That's all. Oh, and all in all, I'm not spending more then 10 bucks."

The first garage we enter is Mike's. I'm amazed. He has such beautiful stuff. For instant, this gorgeous Japanese vase. We gave him the vase when we went to his place for a dinner party last winter. I remember spending $100 on it, and here Mike, without any sense of dignity, dares to ask only three bucks for it! The nerve of that man! He obviously suffers from severe amnesia, as he's also selling those amazing miniature ivory elephants I brought to his wife's birthday. I don't want to tell you how expensive and rare they are. He asks $4 for them, and without me even getting a friend's discount!

Next, we visit Garry and Sharon's garage. There I have a dear reunion with five deluxe-edition children's books that I gave to their son last year for his birthday "Fifty cents a piece!" Garry says to me, smiling. I hate that ungrateful blond couple. They're so Barbie and Ken.

Which reminds me that three months ago, the original Barbie and Ken dolls, along with Ken's metrosexual wardrobe, cost me $65 on sale. I gave the dolls to Garry and Sharon's daughter. Livid, I buy them back for a dollar "a piece!"

Slowly, my new 50-cent shopping bag filled. I'd given it to Hanna last Chanukah and paid 50 bucks for it.

When we got home, I looked at my new purchases, feeling panicky. Only the antique chair – Barbara and Fred's 20th anniversary, two years ago – gave us pause, but we pushed it determinedly to the basement hall.

The experience made me decide two things: one – nobody in the neighbourhood really appreciates me. Two – we're having a garage sale next week.

Don't be surprised to get your presents for a quarter!

BBQ RIBS IN HOISIN-PEANUT MARINADE

4 lb. beef spareribs OR Miami ribs
2/3 c hoisin sauce, divided
1/4 c + 1 tblsp creamy peanut butter, divided
1/4 c + 1 tblsp honey, divided
1/4 c rice wine or dry sherry
1/4 c soya sauce
4 tblsp water, divided
2 garlic cloves, minced

Place ribs in large resealable plastic bag. In medium bowl, stir together 1/3 c hoisin sauce, 1/4 c peanut butter, 1/4c honey, rice wine, soy sauce, 2 tbls. water, garlic. Pour into bag over ribs and seal bag. Refrigerate at least 4 hrs, turning bag occasionally. When ready to cook ribs, heat BBQ to medium-high, remove from marinade and place on BBQ; discard marinade in bag. Cover grill. In small bowl prepare rest of basting sauce - combine remaining 1/3c hoisin sauce, 1 tblsp. peanut butter, 1 tblsp. honey, 2 tblsp. water. Grill ribs until browned and crisp, turning and brushing with remaining sauce halfway through grilling. To serve, cut into separate ribs.

Brave voices of dissent

Throughout history, the Jewish People, have had to manage our allegiance to our host countries in a delicate way so as not to be seen as disloyal citizens.

Today, in Canada, we still grapple with this issue, either because we think there's a very real concern for our safety, or because we carry with us the heavy baggage of the past, when Jews were viewed as a little bit less equal in the eyes of our neighbours.

Zul zein shtil ("keep quiet") is still alive, albeit looking dated.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Recently this issue was put to the test in our community over the Conservative government's decision to cut health care coverage for refugee claimants. If these changes go through, as of June 30, all refugees will lose access to preventative health care and life-saving medications, such as insulin, through the Interim Federal Health Program.

Refugees from what the government is calling "designated countries" will also lose access to emergency care. This includes pregnant women, children and people facing acute crises, such as heart attacks. One country that's sure to be on the designated country list is Hungary, targeting Roma, a people that was victimized by Hitler and is still persecuted today.

For months, virtually all medical affinity groups protested these health care policy changes, as did many major religious denominations. Physicians and health providers marched outside the offices of Conservative MPs protesting vehemently that these laws will deny people life-saving drugs, prevent them from receiving medical care and potentially result in severe illness and death to children, women and men.

The Jewish community, through its rabbis and private citizens, also protested, calling on our memories of when boatloads of Jews were sent back by Canada to their deaths during this country's "none is too many" era.

Former Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber, together with lawyer Clayton Ruby and Dr. Philip Berger, co-wrote a June 15 opinion piece in the Globe and Mail headlined, "No refuge in Canada for some refugees."

In it, these three vocal Jews stated: "Today, we go on record as Jews and descendants of immigrants to say that we oppose cuts to refugee health care and the designation of so-called 'safe' countries. Denying other human beings health care and a haven based on their country of origin is simply wrong. As Jews and human rights activists, we know well that countries deemed safe for the majority can be deadly for some minorities."

The Jewish voice of dissent rang out.

These were proud moments, because it meant that we have moved forward despite our fears and found our way to the frontlines of protest, challenging our government's direction.

It's an important time for Canadian Jewry, as many of our rabbis and rank-and-file (some of whom voted Conservative) are demonstrating maturity and leadership as our national leaders begin tinkering with rights that protect the "stranger." It's heartening to see that so many Jews feel it's OK to fight the Conservatives and their majority government – who are staunch supporters of Israel – and not be afraid.

Of course, there are those in our community who support the Conservatives because they're ideologically aligned with them, while others support the government unconditionally, because they believe to do otherwise would be disloyal.

Many Jews appreciate the government's stand on Israel. But it's our right to be here, and it's our responsibility to question our government's policies. We're grateful to live in a place that allows us to do so.

Canada, Israel broaden energy ties

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canada and Israel last week signed a new energy agreement that has the potential to massively benefit both countries economically.

Natural Resources Minister Joe Oliver completed a weeklong economic mission to the Jewish state on Saturday during which he met with top Israeli energy sector officials, concluded the June 26 agreement with his counterpart, Uzi Landau, Israel's minister of energy and water resources, and met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"There's significant untapped potential in trade with Israel," Oliver said.

The text of the agreement, while non-specific, states that both countries will try to meet bilaterally "to discuss energy cooperation by taking advantage of opportunities when both are present at major energy events and fora."

Speaking to reporters via conference call from Haifa on June 28, Oliver said he expected Landau to visit Canada sometime in the fall to gather further "information and build relationships in the energy and natural resources sectors."

The recent discoveries of major oil and natural gas deposits both onshore and offshore in Israel mean the tiny state could become energy independent in the near future.

Experts estimate that the Shfela Basin, located about 30 kilometres southwest of Jerusalem, contains more than 250 billion barrels of shale oil. That would place Israel third globally in shale oil resources, behind only the United States and China. The resource is also as big as the 250 billion barrels of conventional oil reserves in Saudi Arabia.

As a result, the potential for increased bilateral trade and investment by both Canadian and Israeli energy sector players is encouraging, Oliver said.

While development and yield from these sites are still years away, Israel could become one of the world's major suppliers of oil and gas, as well as providing for its own energy needs.

Bronfman Fellows

MONTREAL — Jacob Shapiro, a graduate of Bialik High School in Cote St. Luc, recently became the only Canadian chosen for the Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel program this year. Shapiro is the second member of his family to be accepted into this program. His brother, Adam, was accepted in 2009.

An unkind cut

BERLIN — Germany's top Jewish leader called on the federal Parliament "to ensure religious freedom" following a Cologne court ruling that said circumcising young boys on religious grounds amounts to grievous bodily harm. Though the decision by the district court of Cologne does not outlaw circumcision, it is "outrageous and insensitive," Dieter Graumann, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, said in a statement issued last week. The court ruled that the "fundamental right of the child to bodily integrity outweighed the fundamental rights of the parents."

'Zionists' get blame

IRAN — An Iranian vice-president blamed "Zionists" for the global drug trade and said the Talmud encourages Jews to promote addiction in non-Jewish communities. Mohammad Reza Rahimi, Iran's first vice-president, made the comments last Tuesday during ceremonies marking the International Day Against Drug Abuse and Illicit Trafficking in Tehran. He said evidence of the Zionists' direct involvement in illicit drugs is the fact that "you cannot find a single addict among the Zionists," the semi-official Iranian FARS news service reported. Referring to the Talmud, he said, "The book teaches them how to destroy non-Jews so as to protect an embryo in the womb of a Jewish mother."

Writer, director dies at 71

Nora Ephron

NEW YORK — Nora Ephron, a film director, author and essayist who wrote the screenplays for When Harry Met Sally and Sleepless in Seattle, has died.

Ephron died of leukemia on June 26 in a New York hospital. She was 71. Only close friends and family knew of the illness, which was diagnosed in 2006.

Her last movie was the 2008 hit Julie and Julia, starring Meryl Streep. Ephron had started out as a journalist before becoming an author and essayist, and later a screenwriter and director.

Her 2006 book of essays titled I Feel Bad About My Neck: And Other Thoughts on Being a Woman became a New York Times bestseller.

Ephron told Daily Forward writer and author Abigail Pogrebin in a 2003 interview for her book Stars of David: Prominent Jews Talk About Being Jewish that she thought of herself "as a Jew, but not Jewish."

Ephron was married three times and divorced twice, the second time from Washington Post reporter Carl Bernstein. Her book Heartburn was a recounting of their marriage.

A graduate of Wellesley College, she was an intern in the Kennedy White House and then worked as a mail girl at Newsweek.

Rabbis urge PM not to cut refugees' health care

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Board of Rabbis has sent a letter to Prime Minister Stephen Harper imploring him to stop modifications to the country's refugee health-care benefits in order to save lives.

Changes to the Interim Federal Health Program, scheduled to take effect on June 30, mean the government would no longer provide supplemental health care to certain refugees during the year after they arrive in Canada, the board said.

Rabbi Michal Shekel

"We have heard clearly from physicians across the country that people will face illness and even death if their access to life-saving medication through the program is cut off. This includes children," the board said in its June 18 letter to Harper.

Under the revised program, refugee claimants from designated "safe" countries will still have their cases heard by the Immigration Refugee Board (IRB) to make their case, but they will no longer receive any supplemental health coverage from Canada unless they have an illness or condition that is potentially hazardous to the public at large, according to the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration.

For example, refugees from designated safe countries of origin arriving in Canada with tuberculosis will receive medical care. Others with diabetes will no longer have insulin covered under the federal program.

The board's letter was signed by its outgoing president and its executive director, Rabbi Howard Morrison and Rabbi Michal Shekel, respectively.

Rabbi Shekel, who is also spiritual leader of Congregation Or Hadash in Newmarket, Ont., said the board didn't send the letter with any political intent, but that it was motivated by how strongly the majority of rabbis felt about this particular issue.

"We are concerned with issues, not partisan politics," she told The CJN. "We sent the letter by email. It's an issue that resonates strongly with the Jewish community."

The Toronto Board of Rabbis said it was also concerned about proposed changes to immigration laws under Bill C-31, Protecting Canada's Immigration System Act, which would allow the government to create a list of so-called "safe countries" – a.k.a. "designated countries of origin" or DCOs in government parlance – that it would not consider dangerous for its citizens and hence disallow asylum claimants from those regions.

If the bill passes, it might turn away legitimate asylum seekers fleeing persecution, including Jews, from countries such as Hungary, which would likely be designated a safe nation despite growing concerns of rising institutional antisemitism and anti-Roma attitudes, the board said

Bill C-31 is now being debated in the Senate.

"We are alarmed at the idea of designating specific countries as safe for all people.

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

Building Jerusalem (5)

In April, CJN reporter Paul Lungen wrote a poignant story about the full-from-the-heart involvement of a retired 87-year-old Yiddish and Hebrew teacher from Toronto (formerly from Montreal), Yankle Gladstone, in the renovation of a run-down 3-1/2-storey building in downtown Jerusalem.

The renovation is not a real estate project.

It is, rather, a communal, caring-for-one-another, "building Jerusalem" project undertaken by the Jerusalem Foundation, Mayor Nir Barkat, and the City Centre (Lev Ha'ir) Community Centre. Indeed, the project is so important that the foundation considers it to be its "flagship" initiative.

The 3-1/2-storey building is a community centre still in the making that will one day become an educational, cultural, athletic, social, young adult, teen, seniors, neighbourhood hub for the many thousands of Jerusalem's residents in or near the downtown core.

As described by the foundation, the essential purpose of the ambitious project is "to create change and redesign the City Centre as a lively and dynamic, creative and positive centre for the populations that live, visit, work and spend time in this area."

The area in question, Morasha, is the neighbourhood, more or less at the end of Jaffa Road, adjacent to the Old City between the Jaffa and Damascus Gates. It is a diverse, colourful, collage of diverse groupings of Jerusalem's residents, many, if not most, of whom live at or under the poverty line.

Yankle's generous involvement in the project is specifically aimed at providing a facility within the centre to help newly arrived Ethiopians adjust to life in the modern State of Israel. But the programming in the centre is an ambitious interwoven multi-purpose, multi-tiered fabric of events, sessions, seminars, opportunities and happenings.

Other Canadians, too, have taken to heart the establishment of this vital community centre in Jerusalem's hardscrabble city centre. Individuals and families from across the country have joined this exceptional effort in building Jerusalem.

That they have is not surprising to Jerusalem Foundation president, Mark Sofer. For, as he pointed out to The CJN last month, due to Canada's multicultural mosaic, Canadians seem intrinsically to better understand the complex socio-ethnic nature of the city and are more in sync with the infrastructure of mutual respect, tolerance and co-existence that the foundation is trying to implant throughout the city.

"Jerusalem will not become an ethnic melting pot," Sofer told The CJN. "But the different ethnic groups can live in harmony, side by side, in this society."

Indeed, so pivotal is the ongoing role of Canadian philanthropists in helping build the community centre that the foundation has called it Canada House. There is even a dedication plaque attached at the entrance to the building that expressly recognizes this distinctive Canadian goodness and generosity toward the people of Jerusalem which reads: "Canada House is dedicated to the many Canadians who share the values of Co-existence, Culture and Community with the Jerusalem Foundation."

Leading the organized charge in trying to respond in innovative, dignity-preserving ways to the needs and distresses of the many individuals who live in the city centre is Uri Amedi, the head of the Lev Ha'ir (City Centre ) Community Council. (See From the editor's desk June 28).

Amedi has an office of course. But he seems perpetually to be outside, walking the streets of downtown Jerusalem seeking the welfare of its people – his people – storing in the Rolodex of his mind even the minutest details of all that he sees or hears: smiles on faces that greet him, broken pipes that need fixing, privation that needs relieving, sadness that needs comforting, success that warrants celebration.

He walks everywhere. He sees everyone.

At a crowded arts and crafts fair one Friday morning last month on Bezalel Street, near the famed Bezalel Arts Academy, I happened upon Amedi. He too was strolling on the street, winding slowly around the many vendors' temporary kiosk displays. He was clearly pleased with the crowded human traffic that was overtly happy in the sunshine and finding boisterous, noisy delight in Jerusalem.

I had met him only five days before. But we embraced an embrace of friends who had not seen each other in a long while.

"Building Jerusalem is holy work," he told me. Then, stretching his right hand across an expanse of the artists' market in front of us, he added "and what you see here is part of that work. Please help us. Please tell your readers that we need their help."

I promised him I would. "The hands will be mine, but the voice will be yours. The voice will be that of Uri Amedi."

When we next utter the prayer for the building of Jerusalem, we must remember that it falls to us, mere human beings trying to better the world, to be God's agents in doing so.

Canadians urged to respond to UC actions

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

With its sweeping moral judgments and harsh condemnation of Israel, a recent United Church of Canada report on Israel/Palestine policy has shocked some people into action.

And with only weeks to go before a church-wide vote, they'd like the rest of us to reach out, too.

When psychologist Ellen Greenberg read in The CJN about a church minister, Rev. Andrew Love, speaking out against the report ("United Church minister wants more balance on Mideast," May 17), she immediately got on the phone – to invite him to dinner.

"She called me out of the blue," said Rev. Love, who lives in Arnprior, Ont. After dinner, they attended an Aish HaTorah Evening to Celebrate Israel, which highlighted an Israeli field hospital in Haiti and other global contributions.

"It was a wonderful experience… to have dinner in someone's home – total strangers – united by a bigger purpose, and a recognition that… this is going to be hard work: home-to-home, church-to-synagogue… relationship building."

Avi Benlolo

Avi Benlolo of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies said that while the United Church of Canada has "backed down" from apartheid language, the report still attempts "to decomplicate a very complicated issue. They're obviously moving in the wrong direction by invoking the Shoah… [and] fail to understand that the Palestinian community is just not interested in a two-state solution."

The report calls for a boycott of "products produced in the settlements and through the occupation," accusing Israel of "stealing" land granted through international law as far back as 1920, according to Richard Bass of the JEd Institute, who also met with Rev. Love while he was in Toronto.

Greenberg, who said she has a "passion for community," said anyone can take action. "Call the United Church in [your] community… Let the minister know that we are concerned both about this suggestion to boycott and also the fact that no Jewish organizations have been invited."

She also suggests writing to the Moderator, the church's elected head.

Benlolo agrees. "People should take the matter into their own hands by reaching out… to all churches in their neighbourhood, making an appointment… and creating a relationship of discussion."

Talking points must highlight "that Israel is a democracy, it's not an apartheid state," and also that "most Jews want to find a reasonable two-state solution."

Several Wiesenthal representatives met with United Church officials, including Rev. Bruce Gregersen, part of the working group that produced the report, who said there's no question of Israel's legitimacy. "To claim otherwise is unacceptable."

In August, the United Church of Canada's general council will debate and vote on the report. "They make decisions on the basis of where they believe God's spirit is leading them," Rev. Gregersen said.

To claims that the report belies the "view from the pew," he said leadership must take a moral stance. "In the 1980s, the church was among the first… to consider the ordination of gay and lesbian people. There was huge opposition… but council decided it was the right thing to do."

But Rev. Love resents the parallel. "Those are two fundamentally different moral imperatives." Where ordination is an internal leadership issue, on Israel "we need to approach with much greater humility. We need to be much more sophisticated in our understanding of the complexity… more balanced with our moral judgment."

Rev. Ross Lockhart, a United Church minister in British Columbia, recently wrote, "I fear that for the United Church of Canada, long ago we somehow adopted a meta-narrative that said 'Israel is bad, Palestinians are good.'"

With 650,000 members, the United Church is Canada's largest Protestant denomination.

One surprise for Rev. Love has been the "diversity of opinion within the Jewish community. When I was in Israel, I was blown away by just how vibrant the democracy is – in its truest sense… The most important thing we can do as Christians is [to] educate ourselves."

"What happens way up there," in upper echelons, "is not as important as… the local level." He's heard Jews say they're "wrestling and hugging" with Israel, and said, "I love that expression! That's healthy, that's positive… that's how we come to a better understanding of one another."

Soiree raises over $50,000 for Mount Sinai

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Hundreds of young professionals gathered recently for a night of opulence and intrigue at the third annual Sinai Soiree.

The party, held on June 21 at the Maro Supper Club in Liberty Village in Toronto's west end, raised more than $50,000 to support women's health and cancer research at Mount Sinai Hospital.

The funding ensures that state-of-the-art health care is provided to the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute and the Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health.

The evening featured a fashion show with models wearing Cosabella and ResultWear lingerie and performances by Nuvo Burlesque, as well as hors d'oeuvres and cocktails.

Young leaders get taste of latest fashions

In previous years, the Sinai Soiree was part of the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary Gala. This year, it was an independent event, organized by Future Sinai and Leadership Sinai – two volunteer leadership groups composed of young philanthropists.

Future Sinai targets 20- to 30-year-olds, while Leadership Sinai targets 30- to 45-year-olds in the Jewish community.

"These two groups are the future of the hospital both in terms of philanthropy and leadership, and I think it's so important for our generation to understand and begin the practice of giving back to our community," said Lauren Winberg, who co-chaired the party with Ashley Steinhauer of Future Sinai and Andrew Miller, Jordan Fogle and Daniel MacDonald of Leadership Sinai.

"Toronto is blessed with having such an active and involved Jewish community, which means there are a lot of events. I think the soiree stands out because it's a night to get dressed up and have a great time, while knowing that the proceeds are supporting their local community hospital, of which, many of us have a personal connection," Winberg said.

Both she and Steinhauer have been involved with the Sinai Soiree for the past three years. "It's such a fun event and a cause that is close to our hearts. My great-grandmother was a Mount Sinai Women's Auxiliary volunteer in the 1960s. It's an incredible feeling to know that we are connected through our passion for philanthropy," Winberg said.

"I know she'd be proud of what Mount Sinai has become and where Future Sinai is going to take the next generation."

Kenney defends changes

As Jews, we know that countries where the majority lives in safety can be dangerous for minority groups. Roma people living in Hungary, for example, face persecution that has been documented by the Simon Wiesenthal Center and other human rights groups," the board wrote.

Reached in Alberta on June 27, Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney said the board's letter was based on false premises and "a great deal of misinformation."

He said no country could ever be designated safe for all people. However, when refugees arrive in Canada from countries not known to produce refugees, there "can be a presumption that few of those claims are likely to be valid."

"One cannot, nor does our new system propose, to reject claims coming from such countries, as this letter suggests," he said.

All claimants will have hearings to evaluate the merits of their asylum claims before the Immigration Refugee Board (IRB), he said. Those from designated safe countries will be processed more quickly through Canada's immigration system, since it's likely their claims will be rejected. This will end up saving Canadians money and freeing up resources for valid refugee claims, he said.

Jason Kenney

Referring to Hungary, Kenney said Canada had experienced a marked increase of refugee claimants from the European nation over the last few years.

"The number 1 source region for asylum claimants to Canada is not Africa or Asia or Latin America… not North Korea or Iran or Venezuela; it's Hungary," he said.

In April, Kenney said he believed many Roma claimants from Hungary were making false refugee claims and abusing Canada's refugee system. IRB statistics confirm a spike in Roma claims from 2010 to 2012.

Kenney questioned rhetorically why Hungarian citizens seeking refuge from their state didn't take advantage of their "full mobility rights" within the European Union.

He said nearly 95 per cent of Hungarian asylum seekers worldwide make their claims in Canada. They do so to enrol in Canada's generous social benefits and to obtain federal work permits and to get supplemental health benefits that are greater than what they get in Hungary, he said.

"One would have to be blind to the facts to suggest there aren't other factors at play in this… 'irregular migration.' This [situation] undermines and abuses our immigration system," Kenney said. "Thousands of unqualified claimants consume massive resources and slow down the system for those bona fide claimants that need Canada's protection."

Rabbi Shekel said the board understands the government is trying to address problems with loopholes in the immigration laws and that Ottawa is not deliberately trying to cause harm.

"But that is exactly what we fear will happen if these changes are made to health-care coverage for people who are refugees," the board wrote. "As Jewish Canadians, many of us have suffered, or watched our loved ones suffer, at the hands of cruel and discriminatory rules for refugees. We cannot stand silent as people's health is put in danger, and their right to Canadian citizenship cast into question due to their country of origin or mode of arrival."

She said the new legislation needed to be better thought out and rewritten in "a more nuanced manner."

"As rabbis and as human beings, we ask that you abandon the idea of 'designated countries' and 'irregular arrivals,' and rescind the proposed changes to refugee health-care coverage," the board wrote.

Asked how he responds to the rabbis' concerns about the upcoming restrictions on health-care coverage for refugee claimants in Canada, Kenney replied: "I've been in parliament for 15 years, and I don't recall ever receiving a letter from the Toronto Board of Rabbis suggesting that Canadians' lives are jeopardized by not having public insurance for 'life-saving medications.' I find it peculiar they would choose to raise this concern for rejected asylum claimants or those with [fraudulent] claims."

He said Canada would still continue to provide "emergency" health benefits to rejected claimants.

"I don't see anyone arguing that we have a moral, legal or humanitarian obligation to provide taxpayer-funded health insurance to people visiting Canada or to illegal immigrants. There are limits. I don't think it's uncompassionate to say that in the real world of scarce resources, we will focus our health resources on Canadian citizens and on resettled refugees," Kenney said.

The list of designated countries of origin has yet to be drawn up, but Kenney said he believes the majority of the list will be made up of countries from Europe.

"Refugees coming from countries in the European Union, where they have universal health-care coverage, will have to get their own health-care insurance [when they come to Canada]. I don't think that's unreasonable at all."

Workers on the front lines of health care in Ontario remain concerned for newcomers.

Andrea Cohen, CEO of Unison Health and Community Services, a non-profit network of health-care facilities in the Toronto area, said her organization serves more than 12,000 clients throughout the city, many of whom are refugees with urgent medical needs. She said depriving them of federally sponsored medical care could end up driving refugees to hospital emergency wards. This might result in increased provincial health costs and longer emergency room wait times.

"People who have health issues without coverage have nowhere else to go but the ER," she said. "If that happens, it will cost taxpayers far more than leaving the current program in place," Cohen said.

Expel Iran from UN

It's time to expel Iran from the United Nations.

Article 6 of the Charter of the United Nations explicitly allows for such a procedure: "A member of the United Nations which has persistently violated the principles contained in the present charter may be expelled from the organization by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council."

The first principle enshrined in the charter is the very one that the government of Iran contemptuously flouts, constantly. "The organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all its members." (Our emphasis)

Tehran rejects the right of a Jewish state to exist in its Muslim Middle East. It abhors, therefore, that Israel must be regarded as equal in sovereignty along with all other member states of the UN. Iran is the world's chief denier of the Holocaust. It is the world's chief sponsor of terrorism around the globe. And it routinely calls for the annihilation of Israel, a fellow member state of the UN.

Could there be more compelling, more persuasive evidence of Iran's "persistent violation of the principles contained in the present charter" than its belligerent, boastful public campaign each day to deny any, let alone sovereign equal, rights to the Jewish state?

The latest Iranian outrage against the Jewish state and the Jewish People occurred last week at a UN-sponsored meeting on global drug enforcement.

Iranian Vice-President Mohammad Reza Rahimi declared that "the Zionists are in firm control of the drug trade… The Islamic Republic of Iran will pay for anybody who can research and find one single Zionist who is an addict." Rahimi also advised his audience that the Talmud "teaches them [Zionists] how to destroy non-Jews so as to protect an embryo in the womb of a Jewish mother."

It was reported that even other Iranians in the room were appalled by his fevered, frenzied declamation of hatred for Jews and Israelis.

Apparently UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon was also upset by Rahimi's remarks. Ban's spokesperson issued the following statement in the secretary general's name: "The secretary general has on many occasions called on Iranian officials to refrain from these kinds of statements. He believes it is the responsibility of leaders to promote harmony and understanding and he deeply regrets expressions of hatred and religious intolerance." (Our emphasis)

Rahimi's remarks were disgusting, ignorant and inciting of hatred. Ban's remarks were craven, pusillanimous and entirely inadequate. He couldn't even find the courage, if not too the will, to actually condemn Rahimi for his ugly bilge about the Jewish faith and Jews.

It's time that steps were taken to remove Iran from the organization whose rules, purposes and principles it so cavalierly disdains.

25 years ago in The CJN

Canadian Jewish Congress expressed "disappointment" at the Supreme Court of Canada decision not to grant Jewish day schools in Ontario the right to government funding. Instead, the court "sent it back to the politicians, telling them not to ask the court to make the laws," said CJC Ontario region chair Charles Zaionz.

Raising kids without day school

I was upset by the perspectives piece "The moral costs of Jewish day school" (June 7), by Rabbi Aryeh Klapper, the dean of the Center for Modern Torah Leadership in Sharon, Mass. In big cities, it is possible, even easy, to raise children who have a strong commitment to Judaism and knowledge of who they are, without sending them to Jewish day schools. Yet the message in articles such as this one is that parents are not capable of doing so.

Public schools are already paid for with tax dollars, and the education in many public schools is excellent. By sending children to public schools, parents do not need two jobs to pay the high cost of day school. Time and energy are left on Friday afternoons to teach your children to make challah and enjoy Shabbat dinners regularly as a family. Parents without the financial burden of day school have money left for joining synagogues, enrolling their children in Hebrew schools and Jewish summer camps and family trips to Israel. There are also many opportunities to be active in the Jewish community: by volunteering and fundraising, by attending Jewish cultural events, many of which are for children, and by participating in community-wide celebrations, such as the one at Yom Ha'atzmaut.

My children are committed young Jewish adults, living and working in the Jewish community. Parents need to know they can make a Jewish home and raise Jewish children no matter what school they send them to.

Objects to Bob Rae's remarks

It is absolutely unacceptable and perverse for interim Liberal leader Bob Rae, who must know better, to call the result of the Six Day War started by five Arab nations planning to push Israel into the sea "imperial adventure" ("Liberal interim leader touts two-state solution," June 21). Rae talks about "more than one narrative." Is that the Liberal Party of Canada's narrative? Is that how he intends to gain credibility with the Arab world? He will certainly not gain my credibility.

The United Church report

In the guest voice "The United Church should not boycott Israel" (June 21), Shimon Fogel, the CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), takes the United Church to task for urging a boycott of settlement products and characterizes their recent report as "marked by historical distortions" and one-sided. I have, as a historian, perused the report and find it to be fairly balanced, giving due weight to the legitimate security concerns of Israelis, as well as to the national claims of both peoples. I would congratulate our Christian friends for having produced a balanced and thoughtful document. Fogel, however, takes exception to their call for a boycott of settlement products. Again, we might congratulate the church for eschewing the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement, which they rightly regard as an assault on the legitimacy of Israel and the democratic forces within the country. They have taken a moderate and responsible position.

LET THEM GO…

Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman, Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

Fogel acknowledges the Jewish community has a healthy diversity of opinion, presumably extending to the settlements, but then proceeds to argue that CIJA must react when the church aims to target Israelis for boycott. Fogel has thereby extended CIJA's legitimate defence of Israel to the defence of settlements, which is still a hotly debated issue. In The Crisis of Zionism, Peter Beinart urges us to distinguish between the democratic Israel, behind the green line, and the undemocratic Israel of the occupation and settlements, the correct target for a boycott. Likewise, Peace Now joined the settlement boycott, after the Knesset made it illegal to advocate such actions and subject to civil damages. Fogel and CIJA are out of line in extending their protection to the settlement enterprise.

Why Raoul Wallenberg's centennial matters

Robert Rozett
JTA

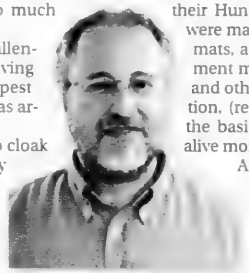
Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who rescued Jews during the Holocaust, was born 100 years ago this summer. His centennial is being commemorated with events in many cities across Europe and North America.

On June 26, a symposium in his memory was held at Yad Vashem's International Institute for Holocaust Research in Jerusalem.

Wallenberg, who was born on Aug. 4, 1912, is one of the approximately 24,000 individuals who have been recognized as Righteous Among the Nations, the honour bestowed by Yad Vashem and the State of Israel upon non-Jews who rescued Jews during the Holocaust.

Why is his centennial the cause of so much commemorative activity?



Robert Rozett

Certainly part of the answer lies in Wallenberg's tragic fate. Early in 1945, after having been involved in rescuing Jews in Budapest since the previous summer, Wallenberg was arrested by the conquering Soviets.

Explanations ranging from the banal to cloak and dagger have been advanced as to why he was arrested. It could simply be that as a foreigner carrying a variety of currencies and official documents on his person, he may have aroused suspicion. It could be that as a Wallenberg, whose family like many neutral Swedes had engaged in business with Germany during the war, he was an intentional target of the Soviet security apparatus. And it may even be that the Soviets suspected that he was being used as an intermediary between the Nazis and western Allies to arrange a separate peace, so that both sides could then turn against them.

None of these reasons, even if one may be the correct one, sufficiently explains why Wallenberg was held in captivity after the war ended, and why neither the Soviets nor their successor regime in Russia have provided the full documentation they most likely still hold regarding his fate. All we know for certain is that at some point, Wallenberg died in Soviet captivity.

In addition to his disappearance, other facets of the story rivet our attention on Wallenberg. In many ways, he has emerged as an icon of the Holocaust, one of a select group of people through which people understand the cataclysmic events. Along with Oskar Schindler, Wallenberg has become the best known and therefore the foremost symbol of the rescuers.

Wallenberg was among a handful of neutral diplomats engaged in a rather wide-ranging rescue operation that evolved after the German occupation of Hungary on March 19, 1944. One could say that effort reached its pinnacle during the period of the Arrow Cross regime in the autumn of that year, and that it continued until the conquest of Budapest by Soviet forces in mid-January and early February 1945.

This was not a single co-ordinated rescue operation. Rather it was composed of different groups and many individuals, often in a kind of confederation, all trying to do the same thing. They strove to keep Jews alive and out of the hands of their persecutors until the Germans and their Hungarian allies were defeated. The rescuers were many and varied, among them neutral diplomats, adult Zionist activists, Zionist youth movement members of all persuasions, church people and others. Through the use of diplomatic protection, (relatively) safe refuges and the provision of the basic necessities of life, they helped to keep alive more than 100,000 Jews in Budapest.

A cardinal reason that Wallenberg is so venerated is bound up in his character and the nature of his mission. In the late spring of 1944, Wallenberg was approached by the Swedish government, which in turn had been approached by the American rescue agency the War Refugee Board. He was asked to go to Hungary as a certified emissary of the Swedish government, and his job was to help Jews.

Wallenberg readily volunteered to enter the conflagration. If this was not enough, unlike other diplomats who confined themselves to rescuing Jews by diplomatic means – certainly a laudable enterprise – Wallenberg at times was out on the streets proffering his aid, in the midst of extreme danger and again on his own volition.

Not only was Wallenberg an emissary of his government, essentially he was an emissary of the western world. In the name of the western world, he not only engaged in rescue, but displayed the best in western values in doing so – courage, compassion and ingenuity. He was the ideal to which the western world would like to have lived up to more during those dreadful war years.

icon of the Holocaust. He may be seen as the example par excellence of the standard of humane behaviour to which the western world aspires. This, of course, is put in high relief by his patently unjust fate.

Clearly, Wallenberg is not the only figure from the Holocaust years worthy of our admiration. All the other Righteous Among the Nations, and the many Jews who engaged in various forms of resistance and rescue and maintained their values and basic human dignity, are no less worthy of our esteem. But as a representative of the best in western civilization, it is fitting and proper that on the centennial of his birth, we remember Wallenberg, learn about him and the context in which he acted, and discuss his deeds and their meaning for us today.

An inspiration for action

Irwin Cotler

Canada observed Raoul Wallenberg Day last Jan. 17, which marked the 67th anniversary of his disappearance at the hands of Soviet forces.

In 1985, Canada declared Wallenberg an honorary Canadian citizen. In 2002, Canada celebrated Raoul Wallenberg Day for the first time.

Wallenberg, a Swedish non-Jew who saved some 100,000 Jews during the Holocaust, confronted the Nazi killing machine in Hungary and showed that one person can make a difference – that one person can resist and that one person can prevail over radical evil.

Wallenberg is most known for his granting of Shutzpasses – diplomatic passes protecting their recipients. This influenced other governments to follow his example and issue passports that saved thousands from the Nazis. He also established 32 safe houses protected by neutral legations, saving some 32,000 people through this initiative alone.

Further, Wallenberg's organization of hospitals, soup kitchens and daycare centres, the staples of international humanitarian assistance, provided women, children, the sick, the elderly – the most vulnerable of victims – with a semblance of human dignity in the face of the worst of all horrors and evils.

Moreover, in November 1944, as thousands of Jews – mainly women and children – were sent on a 125-mile death march, Wallenberg followed them, distributing food and medical supplies, and improvised certificates, once again saving people consigned to death.

Wallenberg's last rescue was perhaps the most memorable. As the Nazis were advancing on Budapest, they threatened to blow up the Budapest ghetto and liquidate the remnants of Hungarian Jews, some 70,000 of them. Wallenberg put the Nazi generals on notice that they would be held accountable for their crimes – that they would be brought to justice, if not executed, for their war crimes – crimes against humanity – and genocide. The Nazi generals desisted from that assault on Budapest, and 70,000 more Jews were saved thanks to the incredible courage of one person who was prepared to confront evil, to resist and thereby to cause evil to be overcome.

Today, Wallenberg deserves to be remembered not only for his heroism, but as an inspiration for action. As U.S. Secretary of State Hilary Clinton and Swedish Foreign Minister Carl Bildt put it, Raoul Wallenberg Day is a chance for us to "reaffirm our common aspiration for moral understanding and justice."

Indeed, each one of us has an indispensable role to play in the struggle for human rights. And it begins with each of us – in our homes, in our schools, in our workplaces, in our human relations, in our daily capacity for acts of care and compassion on behalf of victims of discrimination or disadvantage somewhere.

Let us reflect upon and be inspired by the unparalleled and unprecedented heroism of this great humanitarian and recommit ourselves to justice, fairness and the bettering of our world.

The right thing to do

I'm president of Kehilat Kol HaNeshama, Jerusalem's largest and arguably its most active Reform synagogue, striving to maintain a semblance of Jewish religious pluralism in a city not always inviting to our like.

Aside from being a wonderful house of prayer, we pride ourselves in three fields of activity, each immensely enriching. While, the first two, congregational and educational pursuits, are each worthy of articles of their own, it is one aspect of the third – social justice – which I presently want to address.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Roughly speaking, our activities in this area are divided into two separate segments – those dealing with charity and those with justice. Tzedakah and tzedek, two words interestingly based on the same Hebrew root.

Our tzedakah activities augment monthly incomes of poor families living in the synagogue's vicinity and help members of our own community and those more peripheral to it facing financial hardships.

Social action is a linchpin of our community. Members, many of whom immigrated to Israel from English-speaking countries, provide free private English classes for needy kids in our environs. We've developed a satellite congregation in Kiryat Yovel, a neighbourhood experiencing a large haredi influx, threatening to change the vicinity's nature. And we just celebrated our third annual Gay Pride Shabbat, the only Jewish religious institution in the country to hold such an event.

But a year and a half ago some of us felt we weren't socially active enough. After examining several potential projects, we settled on two. One aims at combating growing racism in Jerusalem – mosque torching; soccer hooligans attacking Arab labourers after Betar Yerushalayim lost a game; businesses proudly advertising the fact they no longer employ non-Jewish workers.

The second, and the one I'm actively involved in, provides support for some 1,000 African refugees presently living throughout Jerusalem, mostly from Sudan and Eritrea. They are a small part of the 60,000-plus refugees now estimated to be living in Israel, most of whom entered the country from the Sinai Peninsula after long African journeys.

In recent years, no government has earnestly dealt with the issue, although Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's has decided to build a fence along our border with Egypt, to prevent more refugees' entry but also with an eye to deteriorating security conditions in Sinai since the onset of the once promising Arab Spring.

Aside from that, little has been done. No real policy dealing with employment, health care and other relevant refugee issues. In the meantime, large refugee populations have moved into poor neighbourhoods in Tel Aviv; significant groups now also reside in Eilat and Arad. Tensions have risen. As have crime rates among refugees. In the wake of two incidents of rape committed by refugees, populist politicians have made irresponsible statements about refugees being a cancer within our midst, and our haredi minister of the interior wants to get rid of all of them as quickly as possible.

My activity with refugees is based on a belief that if they are in our midst, we should treat them humanely. While this conviction has biblical foundations such as Deuteronomy's "you shall love the stranger, for you were once strangers in the land of Egypt," for me it just seems the right thing to do. The way I would want to be treated if I were in their shoes.

In that vein, last September, the Reform movement opened a kindergarten for children of foreign workers and refugees at its headquarters in Jerusalem. Once a week, for now, Kol HaNeshama volunteers add hours of activity, beyond the kindergarten's regular schedule, so the kids' parents can stay at work longer.

We have also opened our premises to weekly Hebrew and English-language instruction for roughly 20 refugees and have hosted a course for volunteers from all walks of life here in Jerusalem to learn more about refugees: their legal status, medical needs, how to empower them and how to help them when faced with bureaucratic and other roadblocks. On June 28, we held a charity event for a refugee youth club, initiated by several of our young adults, at which we exhibited art created by refugees and held a joint concert of our own and their singers.

I'm not averse to the government developing a responsible policy for dealing with refugees, and I don't oppose sending some home if it won't endanger them. But so long as they're here, we at Kol HaNeshama will continue caring for them. It's the only way we know.

Amnesty's moral compass is broken

When a terror squad crossed the Israeli border from Sinai in June, with enough weapons and explosives for a mass attack, and then dozens of rockets were launched from Gaza against Israeli civilian targets, Amnesty International's moral compass was disconnected. These self-proclaimed guardians of human rights published no reports with condemnations, held no press conferences, and issued no "urgent actions" to almost three million members around the world calling for the perpetrators of these war crimes to be brought to justice.

In contrast, during the same month, the officials who run this powerful organization found the time and resources to publish a lengthy "report" repeating unverified Palestinian "testimony" alleging Israeli infractions through administrative detention of terrorist suspects. The publication was an integral part of a political campaign focusing on a hunger strike by Palestinian prisoners, including those tried, convicted and serving sentences for involvement in mass terror attacks. The recommendations repeat many of those found in Amnesty's previous publications, including ones that fed the notorious UN Goldstone mission in 2009, which seek to justify international action to restrict and then remove Israeli independence and sovereignty.

Amnesty does not publish the names of the authors of its report (in violation of human rights reporting guidelines), but the latest attacks on Israel include contact information for Deborah Hyams and Saleh Hijazi, who are described as "researchers," whatever that may mean. Both have backgrounds that reflect flagrant anti-Israel bias. In 2001, Hyams went to Beit Jala (near Bethlehem) as a "human shield," to deter Israeli responses to Palestinian assaults against the residents of the Gilo neighbourhood of Jerusalem. In 2008, Hyams signed a public letter referring to Israel as "a state founded on terrorism, massacres and the dispossession of another people from their land." In 2002, Hyams said "that while she does not condone suicide bombings, she personally believes they 'are in response to the occupation.'"

The other Amnesty "researcher" for Israel, Saleh Hijazi, is a Palestinian born in Jerusalem and raised in Ramallah, and has worked as a public relations officer for the Palestinian Authority. In 2007, he was listed as contact for the NGO "Another Voice" – under the group's signature "Resist! Boycott! We Are Intifada!" This organization used threats to force the cancellation of a peace concert and then proudly crowed about its dubious achievement.

Amnesty's assignment of biased individuals such as Hyams and Hijazi to work on Israel-related issues is yet another demonstration of the depths to which this organization has sunk in exploiting the facade of human rights. And this is not their only example of moral failure. In December 2009, longtime secretary general Irene Kahn and her deputy, Kate Gilmore, suddenly left Amnesty and received what were later found to be "excessive" payments, "above what was legally and contractually necessary." In an independent inquiry, these were shown to be due to "systemic failures in management and governance" that "had accumulated in previous years."

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Prior to this scandal, Kahn had presided over the effort to silence Gita Sahgal, the head of their gender equality section, who criticized Amnesty's co-operation with Moazzam Begg, whom she termed "Britain's most famous supporter of the Taliban." And for years, while obsessively attacking Israel's open society, officials all but ignored the brutal regimes in Syria, Libya, Egypt and the rest of the Arab world. As a result, they have no credibility or impact in the countries where human rights continue to be trampled.

Thus, Amnesty's contribution, along with groups such as Human Rights Watch (HRW), to the frontal assault on the right of the Jewish People to national independence and sovereign equality is another dimension of extensive ethical collapse. For more than a decade, Amnesty and HRW have been pushing the Durban strategy through false claims of "war crimes" and "violations of international law."

The members and funders of these organizations, including Canadians, have the responsibility, as well as the power, to act strongly and consistently to repair this broken moral compass. Instead of receiving "urgent actions," the membership should be sending all Amnesty officials a message demanding their resignation and the restoration of the core principles of human rights to include Israelis and Jews.

Survivors look back at terrorist attack

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Every year at the end of May, Shelley Black and her childhood friend, Jennifer Parnell, get together, raise a glass of wine and toast l'chayim – to life.

Shelley and Jennifer have every reason to celebrate life. Forty years ago, on May 30, 1972, they very nearly lost theirs. The two of them were teenagers embarking on what they hoped would be the trip of a lifetime – a visit to Israel followed by a trek through Europe.

Flying El Al from Paris, they had just arrived in the airport in Lod, today's Ben Gurion International Airport. Excited about their adventure, they were first off the plane and first through customs. They were removing their luggage from a conveyor belt when three terrorists, members of the Japanese Red Army, allies of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, who had just arrived from Rome, pulled machine guns and grenades from their baggage and started firing indiscriminately at arriving passengers.

Twenty-six people were killed and 80 wounded before two terrorists died and the third was captured by Israeli security personnel.

It was an incident that shocked the world and captured international headlines – no one had shot up an airport before.

Black can remember the incident as if it happened yesterday. It was a traumatic experience for a teenager, she said. The dead, the dying and the wounded were all around them. When the shooting began the two fell to the ground and held their purses over their heads, an instinctive reaction to save themselves from the deadly barrage of flying bullets and shrapnel.

"I saw him take out a machine gun and start shooting. It sounded like firecrackers, but it wasn't firecrackers. Bang, bang, bang. If he'd shot to the right, he'd have hit us, but he went in the other direction," Black recalled.

"I remember hearing shouting and screaming and crying. We held our purses over our heads, as if that would save us from anything."

Parnell recalls it slightly differently. The two of them, friends since elementary school, hurried off the plane to get their luggage. Black's was already off the belt and she spotted her bag entering the luggage area. "I ran to get it at the end of he conveyor belt when all of a sudden, there was all these bright lights and incredible noise, which shocked me. Ten feet in front of me was this man, kneeling and shooting in the opposite direction."

Lod Airport after terrorist attack

"I was terrified." After briefly considering jumping the shooter, "survivor mode took over," Parnell said. She and Black ran in the opposite direction and hid behind a conveyor belt. I remember we lay on our stomachs and said, 'are you okay, have you been shot?' We looked at each other and said 'it's going to be okay,' but I felt this could very well be the end of my life."

Looking up, Black saw a woman with blood gushing from her chest as if from a fountain. There was chaos everywhere.

At one point, Jennifer peeked out from their position next to the luggage carousel to see the terrorist hurling grenades at passengers. He was standing just above her, Black said.

Most of the victims were Christian pilgrims from Puerto Rico.

The whole incident likely lasted only a few minutes, but it's burned into her consciousness and has stayed with her all these years, Black said. She's kept the suitcase she arrived with, with its bullet holes, and a pair of slacks that likewise are ridden with bullet holes.

One of the terrorists died when his grenade exploded, another was killed in a crossfire with the third gunman. It's still not known if those were accidental or intentional suicides. The third gunman, Kōzō Okamoto, was arrested.

After the shooting was over and medical personnel tended to the wounded, she and Jennifer were allowed to leave, without being interviewed by police.

"We got up and clutched each other. We said, 'don't look there, don't look down.' We walked around a lot of bodies that were on the floor and we walked out of the airport," Parnell said. Outside, survivors were in shock. One person came up to them and said he'd seen two others next to him go down and so he too hit the floor. "He wanted to know if he was shot," Parnell said, but he wasn't.

Black's parents had arranged for them to be picked up at the airport, but the driver, Ezekiel, was sent away.

The pickup was one of the arrangements made in advance to make their trip to Israel go smoothly. They were there to celebrate Shelley's brother, David's, bar mitzvah. Some 60 family members, from their homes in Peterborough, Detroit and Toronto were scheduled to fly to Israel, but Black and Parnell decided to get a head start, visit Paris for a few days and arrive in Israel ahead of the others.

Once they exited the airport, they joined two couples from Germany and France in hiring a "sherut" taxi to take them to Tel Aviv. There, Black tired to phone her parents but at first they couldn't get an international phone line out of the country.

When they explained to the operator they had survived the Lod attack, they were given a line out and they contacted Black's parents in Montreal. It was the era before the Internet and cable news; they had not heard of the incident.

"We're okay," Black told her folks.

Parnell did not want to speak to her parents directly, thinking they'd convince her to return at once. Instead, one of Black's relatives contacted them to let them know she too was unharmed.

Later she found out her mother had spent the day vacuuming the house all day "so she wouldn't have to think about what might have happened to me," Parnell said.

Ezekiel was dispatched to pick them up and he took them back to his apartment in Jerusalem.

"He opened a bottle of wine to drink l'chayim because we were alive," Black said.

Despite the tragedy, the bar mitzvah went ahead. "It's so important to celebrate life and those milestones," Black said.

And they resumed their trip; "We spent three great weeks on a kibbutz. We had the time of our lives," she said.

Nevertheless, they were still traumatized by their experience. "We were so shaken up that if someone slammed a door, we'd jump a mile high," she said.

"We were surrounded by [Shelley's] family and relatives and people close to us and we were with people who kept us close to them for two weeks at the bar mitzvah and touring. I think that really helped," Parnell said.

From Israel, they continued their vacation to Greece, taking a boat from Haifa instead of flying from the airport. After six weeks traipsing across Europe, they returned home. "We enjoyed every minute of living," Black said.

The experience was life altering for both of them. "You realize that your life can turn around in a second," Parnell said. "I think I've become more grateful to be alive. Many times after that, if I had a bad day or things weren't going so well, I'd think I might have died at 17."

"I appreciate and I have gratitude for what I have in my life, my wonderful family and friends," Black said. "I was given the opportunity to live my life and so many others were not."

"You can't curl up into a ball, you need to embrace life and make the most of it, for the people killed that day and their families. Otherwise, we wouldn't be honouring their memories," she added.

That's why she is a strong supporter of the effort to convince the International Olympic Committee to hold a moment of silence for the 11 slain Israeli athletes, killed by Palestinian wterrorists at the Munich Olympics.

She'd been home in Peterborough a few weeks when the attack took place. "I remember watching what happened and being horrified and feeling empathy for the athletes and their families. I thought, these are innocent people who are having to fight for their lives."

She also wondered, "How can there be people who value life so little?"

When she sees prisoner exchanges, in which convicted terrorists are released before serving the full term of their sentence, she thinks, "that person does not value life and yet they are the ones being released."

She was greatly upset when Okamoto, the surviving terrorist, was released in 1985 in a prisoner exchange.

"Every time there is a prisoner exchange, I think of the people who were killed. How does that honour their memory?" Black asked.

"It's really hard to imagine why they should be free in those prisoner exchanges. It's heartbreaking to know that people who hold no significance in the lives of others are given their lives back."

So every year, on the anniversary of the attack, she and Jennifer get together, raise a glass and recall that day.

"For us, it's important to keep alive the memory of the people who were killed," Black said.

"In my life, I always try to support Israel and the idealistic tenets it is based on. And we acknowledge with gratitude to God that we were spared, and hope that my life has significance."

UN commissioner critical of Quebec law

The long, sad history of the United Nations' singling out Israel for criticism while ignoring serious, systemic human rights violations elsewhere stopped being news long ago, if it ever was.

What is news, however, is the recent penchant of some UN agencies to give Canada a taste of the same.

In the June 19 National Post, Graeme Hamilton drew attention to one such event. The day before, in Geneva, Navi Pillay, the UN's high commissioner for human rights, delivered the opening statement to the 20th special session of the Human Rights Council.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

What caught Hamilton's attention was Pillay's singling out Canada, specifically Quebec, for its controversial Bill 78, which stipulates conditions on how student-led protests in the province are to be conducted, and imposes fines for violations.

About midway through her address, Pillay said: "Moves to restrict freedom of assembly in many parts of the world are alarming. In the context of student protests, I am disappointed by the new legislation passed in Quebec that restricts their rights to freedom of association and of peaceful assembly."

As Hamilton noted, given Pillay's alarm, all she found worthy of mention was Quebec, not true prohibitions on "freedom of assembly" in non-democratic lands like China, Cuba, Iran, Saudi Arabia and many other places. Regarding just one such omission, Hamilton wrote that Pillay "had no time for the Tibetan herder who died last week after setting himself on fire to protest Chinese repression, the 30th Tibetan to suffer such a fate since 2009."

Hamilton cited Hillel Neuer, the head of UN Watch, an NGO that monitors bias at the United Nations. According to Hamilton, Neuer claimed that when he demonstrates outside the UN's Geneva headquarters, he has to comply with stricter conditions than those in Bill 78.

"'When I do a human-rights rally, I have to fill out all kinds of police permits, and I doubt that [Pillay has] ever issued a statement saying that the demonstrators in front of her building don't have enough rights,' Mr. Neuer said."

"What's behind [Pillay's] preposterous move?" law professor Anne Bayefsky asks in "The UN's twisted human rights agenda" (National Post, June 21). Bayefsky writes that the most troubling thing about Pillay's singling out of Canada was her failure to acknowledge "the essential distinction" between democratic and non-democratic governments under a twisted concept of even-handedness.

And speaking of "singling out" – late last month, American author Alice Walker was back in the news over her refusal to allow an Israeli publisher to translate her novel The Color Purple into Hebrew. Her reason? Because Israel, in her view, is guilty of practising "apartheid" against the Palestinians, both inside Israel and in the territories. So feverish is her attitude about the Jewish state that she's on record charging that what occurs in Israel is "far worse" than what occurred under apartheid South Africa.

The CBC's Neil Macdonald took Walker to task in a June 21 cbc.ca posting, accusing her (in characteristically strong terms) of appearing "to be eagerly embracing self-censorship, participating in what amounts to a pre-emptive book-burning."

As he explained: "What makes me most uncomfortable about the kind of fervent activism that Walker and her fellow travellers advocate is not their boycott... Rather, it is the fact that they are so certain of themselves that they would blithely consent to stamp out speech."

Alice Walker

Not known as one to shy away from criticizing Israel, on this occasion, Macdonald reflected on the country's democracy: "Whatever one might think of Israel's policies, its population is a thoughtful one, and its government allows dissenting expression at a level that does not exist elsewhere in the region... The fact is, most Israelis believe in the free exchange of ideas. Yes, they can be pretty nasty about things if they don't like your ideas, but they are generally committed to the bedrock principle of free discourse. Which, incidentally, is why most western media outlets base their Middle East correspondents in Jerusalem or Tel Aviv."

גידי קורן וחברים

החיים כמו קפה:

דברו בנדיבות,

ושתאהבו בנדיבות.

מה יהיה

Camp Gesher helps build bridges, Israeli emissary says

Meir Shenhav
Special to The CJN

Campers will have to sweat for their own food, this year, Yael Polunsky said jokingly.

Polunsky is an Israeli shlichah (emissary) for Camp Gesher, the Ontario summer camp run by Habonim Dror, a labour Zionist youth movement.

"We decided to focus more on building bridges between our values and the child's life and actions. This year, we are working on building a farm in the camp. The campers could work there, learn about the connection between labour and Zionism, and grow their own food."

Polunsky, 27, came to Toronto from Jerusalem last year, and, in addition to her work at the camp, she also runs programs for the Jewish and Israeli community in downtown Toronto at the Miles Nadal JCC. This is her sixth mission, after working with Jewish communities in the United States, Belarus, Ukraine and India. She has been working in informal Jewish and Zionist education programs for more than 10 years.

"Every summer, we run an overnight summer camp, Camp Gesher [which means bridge]," Polunsky said. "The camp is located about three hours north-east of Toronto, in a beautiful forest on the shore of Pringle Lake. Our camp, like our movement, is a youth-led camp where our campers are the leaders."

Most of the 220 campers are from Toronto and Thornhill, Ont., although some come from other Jewish communities in Ontario.

"There are [also] shinshinim [young Israeli emissaries] working at the camp as counsellors and Israel specialists. They run activities about Israel, scouting and Hebrew, while connecting with the campers and other counsellors," Polunsky said.

"In the last few years, we have been working with the Yaldenu organization, which brings Israeli campers to camps in North America. [This year] we'll be joined by six 15-year-old campers from southern Israel. They will stay with our oldest group throughout one session. The Israeli campers also run a few activities for their fellow campers, and make a lifelasting relationships with the Canadian campers."

Yael Polunsky

The camp has been working with Kachol Lavan, an Israeli Hebrew school in the Toronto area supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, and Gesher will host a trip to the campsite for some of the students.

The Kachol Lavan kids will be there for a three-day weekend to get to know the camp and the campers, use the waterfront and other facilities, go hiking in the area and participate in activities in Hebrew.

"Our campers are connected to Israel, either because their parents or grandparents were born In Israel, or because their parents are very much Zionists and support Israel," Polunsky said. "We [know] that Israeli immigrants to Canada are hesitant about sending their kids to an overnight summer camp, but we don't want them to miss out on this experience that we are so happy to provide."

Moshe, one of the campers' fathers, shares his experience: "Camp Gesher is a community and a family-oriented camp. The alumni keep a great relationship with their fellow movement friends that they grew up with. I was a camper when I was a child, and now I'm sending my kids to the camp so they can have the same adventures. It helps the kids in building their Jewish and Zionist identity. They learn about Israel, about the Jewish world, they learn different skills and have a lifelong experience."

In addition to the camp, the Toronto branch of Habonim Dror runs programs during the year. A communal house opened last year, to function as a hub for different activities including Shabbat dinners and holiday celebrations.

The house is also the home for five counsellors who are implementing the movement's values by living together in a communal manner, while running all the activities, Polunsky said.

"We also run educational activities for the greater Jewish community about Israeli topics, Judaism, Zionism and world events," she said. "This year we had more than a dozen different activities in synagogues and organizations. We run holiday activities for kids at the Miles Nadal JCC, work with young kids and toddlers at the PJ library and celebrate the holidays with the seniors at Baycrest."

As part of the Zionist movement, Polunsky said, "you get to learn new things from new perspectives, you meet new friends who share the same interests and you invest in yourself as a counsellor and a leader."

Rabbi Stern retires from Shaarei Tefilah

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Moshe Stern will become rabbi emeritus of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation on Aug. 19 (Rosh Chodesh Elul), exactly 32 years after he became spiritual leader of the modern Orthodox congregation.

He and his wife, Sarah, plan to spend winters in Israel, where they have a home in Ramat Beit Shemesh, close to their son and his family.

"I just believe the time has come," said Rabbi Stern, 68. He and Sarah – who have five children, "numerous" grandchildren, and two great-grandchildren – also want to spend time with the rest of their family, including children in New York and Toronto.

"It's the right time to transfer the leadership of the shul to a younger generation," said the Montreal-born rabbi. He will be succeeded as senior rabbi by Rabbi Rafi Lipner, who was hired by the shul three years ago to attract young couples to the congregation. Rabbi Lipner will continue to be associated with The House, a Jewish learning centre for students and young professionals, where he is executive director.

Rabbi Moshe Stern

Among his retirement plans, Rabbi Stern said he would like to write a book about his experiences as a rabbi. As well, he said, he's always wanted to translate the works of the Maharal of Prague. "I've always been fascinated with his philosophy and approach to Jewish law. I find it very progressive and fascinating and deep."

Reflecting on the past three decades at Shaarei Tefillah, Rabbi Stern said he's been "blessed with a synagogue that has allowed me to connect with the community at large. Very often in the Orthodox world, rabbis can become insulated and isolated... I've always believed we are part of a larger Jewish community."

'It's the right time to transfer leadership of the shul to a younger generation'

He attributes a significant part of his philosophy to his previous pulpit position in Mountain Brook, Ala., where he "learned very quickly that in order for the small Jewish community to survive and thrive, we all have to get along and work together."

As well, he added, he was determined to change what he feels is a common perception of Orthodox rabbis in the Jewish community: "That we are rigid, uncaring, unconcerned with the welfare of the total community and that we have negative views about the State of Israel.

"I think in my way, maybe in a small way, I was able to change that kind of perception that people might have of Orthodox Judaism, which I prefer to call Torah-oriented Judaism."

The flip side is that his own perceptions have also been affected. "When you're out in the community, you realize that every Jew is a Jew. Everything else are just labels. When you start talking to people and when you see others who might not consider themselves Orthodox, who care about Judaism and the State of Israel, you see that we are one people," he said.

"And yes, I would like to see everybody observant the way I understand observance needs to be... The perception sometimes within the Orthodox community is that you have Orthodox Jews, and everybody else is assimilated. That's not an appropriate picture of the reality of the Jewish community."

Applying principles of Jewish leadership

In a recent article (reprinted in The CJN on June 21), Britain's Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, eruditely synthesized what he describes as the seven principles of Jewish leadership. While his remarks, in their original articulation, were primarily intended to mark the 20th anniversary of a leadership program for young professionals in the United Kingdom's Jewish community, their relevance stretches well beyond the chief rabbi's home base.

His briefing, in its entirety, could be regarded as core content for any organization that aspires to genuinely, creatively and inclusively serve the best interests of its supporters. But perhaps even more important than his broader concepts are some highly perceptive kernels of advice, expressed almost as clichés, that encapsulate the very essence of informed, constructive communal leadership.

He stresses, for example, that "leadership is teamsmanship," that "before you can lead, you must have a vision of the future and be able to communicate it," that leaders (should) study more than others because "study makes the difference between the statesman and the politician, between the transformative leader and the manager," that "the highest form of leadership (in Judaism) is teaching," with the corollary that "power begets followers; teaching creates leaders," and that we need "to make friends within and beyond the Jewish community, to emphasize the ethical and spiritual dimensions of Judaism… and to find ways of making Jews feel proud to be Jews."

Sadly, though there are of course exceptions, we see very little of this vibrant brand of leadership within those agencies, both local and national, that claim to represent the "mainstream" of the Canadian Jewish community.

My View

Lawrence Hart

Rather than "teamsmanship," what we have mostly seen over the past several years is the all but complete abdication of influence and responsibility by lay leaders to a select cadre of professional "managers" who have been perceived as mostly trying to solidify their positions and entrench a status quo that tends to be inward looking, less than tolerant of voices that offer different or, heaven forbid, critical viewpoints, and plays to the whims of major donors more than to the priorities of its grassroots constituents.

If one looks objectively at the performance of many of these organizations, it is hard to identify anything approaching the transformative, visionary style that Rabbi Sacks refers to; nor, for the most part, do we see very much in the way of leadership that unequivocally promotes Jewish pride and Jewish ethics and spirituality in all of their complexity and diversity. Also, in deference to what is frequently termed "local needs," we are seeing, all too often, a relegation of the centrality of Israel and Zionism as the principal focus of community engagement and advocacy.

Given what appears to be the prevailing culture within much of the Canadian Jewish establishment, there is little to suggest that the wise counsel of a Rabbi Sacks will have much influence on the entrenched hierarchies that currently give direction to, and speak on behalf of, Jews across our land. This is most unfortunate since, in the process, segments of a capable older generation with the experience and vision to lead and an inventive younger generation with the energy to lead, are both becoming increasingly alienated.

Phillip Lepofsky, UJA Shem Tov Award Winner
by: Michael and Vivian Lepofsky

We had the distinct pleasure of attending the UJA Federation Awards night on Wednesday, May 23rd. It was a very special night for us as Phillip was recognized with a beautiful Shem Tov award. When we first heard that Phillip was receiving an award for excellence in volunteer service we were not so much surprised, as just overwhelmed.
It is hard to express the immense sense of pride, love and respect we have for Phil and his accomplishments.

Throughout his life Phillip has always managed to act as a shining example of goodness. He is a truly fine individual with a caring heart, a positive attitude, and a gentle soul. Phillip has given me much of my inspiration in life through his own strength and determination, and his ability to overcome most obstacles.

Phillip was able to celebrate this beautiful evening along with the other outstanding award recipients who were honoured for their efforts and dedication to the Jewish community. The most beautiful part of the evening was seeing Phillip's sheer joy when he received this award. Phil was in his glory that night, being recognized for his achievements and surrounded by family and friends. The UJA and Reena made this a very special night for him.

We are incredibly proud of Phillip for his dedication and commitment to both Reena and the Toronto Jewish community. We are extremely grateful to Reena for assisting Phillip in reaching these goals, and especially thankful to Sandy Keshen and the Reena team for nominating him for this award that he will cherish forever. Reena is a caring community that plays a strong and supportive role in Phillip's life, and has helped him develop into the wonderful and caring gentleman that he is.

Congratulations Philly!

Israeli Olympic oddities and dreams

The Olympics is serious business. Controversies abound. Athletes breaks records. And then there are the stories that don't get their share of the headlines. Here are three, starting with Israel's quest to find a mascot for its Olympic team.

The problems began when the Olympic Committee of Israel (OCI) unveiled "Shpitzik," a smiling cactus-shaped torchbearer decked out in a natty blue-and-white tracksuit. Unfortunately, the folks at Israeli Educational Television felt that Shpitzik resembled their 1970s-era character, "Kishkashta." (Imagine Bert – of the Muppet's Bert and Ernie – except that he's green and has cacti sprouting from his ears.) The matter was referred to the Tel Aviv District Court, which ruled in favour of veteran Kishkashta and put Shpitzik out of the running – literally. [http://bit.ly/jolymp45]

In a bid to find a successor to Shpitzik, Israel's Olympic Committee then set its eyes on "Baby Bamba." If you've ever dined on Bamba, Israel's popular peanut-based snack food, you would have noticed a cartoon character on the package – a smiling, single-toothed baby bedecked in a diaper. Hand Baby Bamba a lit torch and – and have manufacturer Osem hand over an undisclosed fee – and presto, you have a new Olympic mascot. [http://bit.ly/jolymp46]

Public outcry over the commercial character's new role forced the OCI to retire the baby character as an Olympic symbol. The result: Israel will have no mascot this summer – neither Shpitzik nor Baby Bamba – to inspire athletes to go Swifter, Higher, Stronger. [http://bit.ly/jolymp47]

Astute visitors to the "Israel" entry at the official London Olympics site will notice that the Middle Eastern country is located in "Europe." [http://bit.ly/jolymp48] Puzzling since neighbouring "Palestine" is located in "Asia." [http://bit.ly/jolymp49] I assumed the International Olympic Committee is not lacking a globe, atlas or Google maps, so I set out to crack this geographic mystery – which I did thanks to website eonotes.com.

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

"Between 1954 and 1974, Israel took part in the Asian Games, but political pressure exerted by Arab countries led to Israel's exclusion from the re-organized Olympic Council of Asia in 1981. In the early 1990s, Israel was admitted into European sports organizations, and became full member of European Olympic Committees in 1994." [http://bit.ly/jolymp50]

Could Israel ever find itself hosting the Summer Olympics? In 2000, three architectural students from Tel Aviv University proposed that their city consider hosting the games in the far-off year of 2012. Their idea was championed by Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai but ridiculed by practically everyone else.

"People made sarcastic comments, asked weird questions and made negative comments," supporter Rafi Peled told Ha'aretz. "Then they sat down, and by the middle of the presentation, the smiles had faded, and they were scratching their heads and looking bewildered, and finally they were just speechless. Then the smiles became genuine and everyone began talking, and they were saying, 'It's a smart idea, it's possible, it's a lovely dream.'" [http://bit.ly/jolymp51]

Obviously, "Project Tel Aviv 2012" never came about. But supporter Yossi Machtey knew it wouldn't be easy: "It's a dream, but the prospects for it happening are 100 per cent. The only question is when. Maybe there'll be no Olympics here before my grandchildren's time, but it will happen sometime or other. I don't mind being Don Quixote."

Better to bless than to curse

Rabbi Leigh Lerner

Rabbinic Reflections

In the movie Moonstruck, Loretta's boyfriend takes off for Italy. At the gate are Loretta and an old woman, who asks, "You have someone on that plane?"

Loretta replies, "Yeah, my fiancé."

The old woman turns angry. "My sister is on that plane. I put a curse on that plane, that it's gonna explode and fall into the sea. Fifty years ago, she stole a man from me. Today she tells me she never loved him... I cursed her that the green Atlantic water should swallow her up!"

Loretta says, "I don't believe in curses."

The woman shrugs and says, "Eh, neither do I."

What, then, do we make of the Torah portion, Balak, when the King of Moab calls upon the non-Jewish prophet Balaam to "Put a curse upon this people [Israel], since they are too numerous for me; perhaps I can thus defeat them..." Is it just superstition, or is there something to this power to curse – and to bless?

Isaac Abravanel, seeing the Inquisition and the expulsion of the Jews from Iberia, says Balaam's curse is public relations and spreading of discord. He says Balaam's sorcery was world-famous. If Balaam cursed Israel, the surrounding nations would pluck up their courage and aid Balak against Israel.

When former U.S. president Jimmy Carter writes a book titled Peace, Not Apartheid, the stature of the man turns the title into a curse against Israel that screws up the courage of others to damn Israel as well, and to use that term, apartheid, against Israeli policies. It takes huge public relations to counteract the damage that such a curse can cause. Abravanel teaches that well-regarded people should not curse, but rather bless the best in others, so that hatred is not stirred up.

Just as Moonstruck's old woman admitted her curse has no power, so Rabbi Joseph Ibn Kaspi suggests that Balaam's curse must be considered only from the point of view of those at the receiving end – the Israelites. Does it really work on them?

Balaam was a renowned sorcerer. People were impressed, as sometimes they are today, by sorcerers and diviners. Some always believe the curses of a person with a large reputation. Some Israelites would take it badly, even though the curse was useless, so God prevented Balaam from cursing them.

Think about how some people react when cursed: "Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words will never hurt me." Yet, words can hurt deeply. When someone who is respected condemns another, that person will usually feel throbs of anguish. The pain of a slap across the face disappears, but the pain of hurtful words is never forgotten.

Just as God sought to save Israel the pain of Balaam's hurtful words, so we should try to step in and see if somehow we can turn hurtful words to blessing.

Curses may not have real power, but the person delivering the curse may be influential, and the words spoken may be an attempt to incite general hatred or the words may be hurtful to an individual. Better to bless than to curse, and we must think carefully of ways to do so when we come into situations where conflict may occur. That may be the best lesson that Balak has to teach us.

To the graduates

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

Bob Hope once said to a graduating class, "To you who are about to enter the real world, my advice is don't go." What follows are a few tough questions for graduates.

Are you afraid of failure? Be assured that if you don't succeed at first, you are running about average. What to learn about success and failure is that the first isn't final and the second isn't fatal.

To the question, "How did you achieve success?, George Bernard Shaw responded, "I dread success. To have succeeded, to have finished one's business on Earth, like the male spider, who is killed by the female the moment, he has succeeded in his courtship. I like a state of continual becoming, with a goal in front and not behind".

When I graduated from high school, a wise teacher offered me this advice, "Don't ever forget, aim for the stars. That way you might land on the roof. But if you only aim for the roof you'll never get off the ground." For a callow youth of 17, this was a challenging message. I was impressed, but never really knew which stars to aim for – there were so many.

How much better it is to fail at some elusive dream or creative enterprise than to succumb to a meagre and limited vision.

Will you retain your intellectual curiosity?

Truth often disturbs what makes us most comfortable. The tracking down of ideas involves greater risk than pouring facts into a receptacle called the brain.

Our age demands open-mindedness, unrelenting doubt, ceaseless probing of life's problems at every stage, with enough independence and flexibility to confront unprecedented dilemmas.

Do the social ills of society trouble you? Problems that confront us are explosive, increasingly numerous and perilously urgent. Some examples? Worldwide racial, ethnic and religious prejudice that sabotage the struggle for peace and undermines the security and moral health of the world.

Then there is political chauvinism that in one country or another foments unrest and disunity and that spurns mature compromise. Often hatred for an "enemy" nation is so virulent that some are more eager to see that enemy expunged than to keep their children alive.

There is the proliferation of atomic weapons, the despoliation of the environment, widespread poverty and the growing disparity in earning power between the wealthy and downtrodden. For the educated person, there should be nothing harder than the softness of indifference.

Do you maintain an appreciation for moral and spiritual values? How do we overcome setbacks and disappointments? Whence comes the impulse to aid our fellows instead of striding over them in the struggle for personal success? Where is the wellspring for the voluntary offering of service to the community, to our neighbour.

The answer lies in non-material values that must be acquired along with basic knowledge. Education's dual objectives must remain clear: education for living as well as education for making a living.

For the graduates this prayer: may you learn to prize integrity above luxury, principle above expediency and value above valuables. May you remember that service is the tuition that you pay for the seat you will occupy in life's classroom. And may you become all that you're capable of becoming.

Edmonton plans Jewish seniors residence

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

EDMONTON — When Edmonton's Tulane and Larry Rollingher Retirement Community opens in the summer of 2014, it will be the only Jewish-focused facility of its kind between Winnipeg and Vancouver.

In mid-June, the Edmonton community held a sod-turning ceremony for its first Jewish seniors' residence, which will be located on the corner of Jasper Avenue and 119 Street, alongside Beth Shalom Synagogue.

The 13-storey building will have 55 suites of assisted living on three floors, which will operate under the auspices of Alberta Health Services. There will be 80 one- and two-bedroom suites on the upper eight floors, as well as a rooftop patio with a glassed-in reading room and a library. Downstairs there will be a kosher kitchen, dining rooms and three retail storefronts.

Fundraising for the $30-million facility began 11 years ago, and the Alberta provincial government has contributed more than $6 million. Approximately $9 million has been fundraised to date.

While its focus will be Jewish, the facility will not be restricted to those of the Jewish faith. But at any one time, the Edmonton Jewish community, which has approximately 5,000 members, has between 50 and 75 Jewish seniors in need of such a facility.

"Many of our parents, and those in need of care, have been scattered throughout the city in facilities where there was limited Jewish cultural programming and an absence of kosher food," said Len Dolgoy, president of the Beit Horim (Our Parents' Home Society). "At a time in their lives when Jewish culture and traditions should help sustain them, we could not provide that care directly."

Tulane Rollingher played a leading role in the fundraising campaign for the new centre after the death of her husband, Larry, in 2000, and arranged that donations in Larry's name be directed to the project. At the sod-turning ceremony, Irv Kipnes, project chair, paid tribute to the Rollinghers' contributions to Jewish Edmonton over the past 100 years. "I cannot think of anything more fitting than to honour them by having their name associated with this significant project," he said.

George VanderBurg, Alberta's associate minister of seniors, said that the project "will provide residents with more options to remain in their community close to family and friends and allow couples to age together as their accommodations and personal-care needs increase.

"Projects like this reflect our government's commitment to meeting changing needs of seniors and supports the premier's vision to increase the number of continuing-care units in the province and the quality of life of residents."

When it opens in two years' time, the management of the facility will be contracted to a company specializing in seniors' care.

Montreal's JGH reports on its own performance

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) has disclosed that three "accidents" occurred in 2010-2011 that "may have contributed to, or resulted in, someone's death."

That information is contained in the latest data made public by the JGH on preventable staff-reported "adverse events" and other statistics related to patient safety.

Last year, the JGH became the first hospital in Quebec to release detailed information on its performance and make it available through its website.

The most common adverse events were medication errors, mistakes related to diagnostic tests and patient falls.

There were also 16 serious accidents requiring medical intervention such as cardiopulmonary resuscitation, to save a life.

In addition, the JGH reports six accidents that "may have contributed to, or resulted in, permanent consequences to someone."

All these events were reported by employees on Quebec government forms used for that purpose.

A total of 1,269 other accidents occurred in 2010-2011 that resulted, for the most part, in patients requiring supplementary specialized care, as opposed to first aid. In a minority of these accidents, the person was admitted to the hospital or their stay was prolonged. In none of these cases, was permanent harm done, the hospital says.

Previously, this type of data was available only to hospital staff and government officials, said JGH executive director Hartley Stern.

"By disclosing the data in terms that are easy to understand, the JGH intends to further improve its accountability to the public.

"This reaffirms our commitment to frankness and transparency by highlighting areas where performance is strong, while identifying those that require additional improvement," said Stern, a physician.

Under adverse events, the JGH also includes "incidents," which it defines as "an action or situation that has not affected anyone's health or well-being, but might have caused harm if it had not been spotted and corrected in time, e.g., water spilled on floor of a corridor."

Such incidents totalled 4,853 in 2010-2011, but only 492 resulted in "minor consequences" to someone, that is, enough to require first aid.

None of these figures include work-related accidents affecting employees.

While the main focus is on patients, these statistics also keep track of adverse events involving patients' relatives, visitors, volunteers and students.

During this period, the JGH had 24,408 admissions, 68,878 emergency visits, and 645,580 outpatient visits (including those to the ER). More than 13,000 operations were performed.

The JGH acknowledges that incidents and accidents are generally under-reported by employees. The scientific literature, it notes, states that only a small percentage of adverse events are reported by staff.

The hospital is trying to encourage staff to come forward by instituting a "no blame, no shame" policy.

It has also launched its "Speak Up!" campaign, part of an effort to improve communication between patients and their families and hospital staff.

Chaired by community representative Bernie Weinstein, the campaign stresses for clinical staff, in particular, the need to listen attentively when patients or their relatives speak up.

The latest data also includes statistics on patient falls and their severity, progress in the prevention of pressure ulcers (bed sores) and pneumonia in critically ill patients on ventilators, and steps to increase the safety of medication management. The report also looks at compliance with a surgical safety checklist instituted by the JGH in 2010.

As for overall patient satisfaction, the hospital believes it is doing well. A random survey is taken of 70 patients discharged each week throughout the year, with each asked 26 questions. For 2010-2011, the combined average was 84.3 per cent, which the JGH interprets as meaning it is "doing a good job of meeting patients' needs and expectations," but there is room for improvement.

Michelle Bitran

"Everyone loves cupcakes." That's why Lily Galperin, 7, chose to hold a cupcake bake sale as a way to raise money for the Make-A-Wish Foundation.

Lily, who lives in Montreal and just finished Grade 1, had been learning about the importance of charity at school, and she wanted to put those lessons into practice. "She had come to me and she said, 'Mommy, I really want to do something. I really want to help people,'" said Stephanie Rappoport-Galperin, Lily's mother.

In her eagerness to help, Lily wasn't sure which cause to choose. "Lily just wanted to help everybody – she wanted [the money] to go everywhere," Rappoport-Galperin said.

The family sat down to talk about different organizations that they could donate to, and after watching videos on YouTube of children with life-threatening illnesses having their wishes come true, Lily quickly decided that the Make-A-Wish Foundation was the charity she wanted to help. The Make-A-Wish Foundation works to bring joy to children who are suffering from severe medical conditions through granting their greatest wish.

Lily's mother suggested a cupcake bake sale as a way to raise money, and Lily was thrilled with the idea. "Cupcakes just seem to make people happy," Rappoport-Galperin said, adding that the personal touches that people can add to cupcakes they make show that the baker is "really putting their heart into it."

In fact, many of the Galperin family's friends put their hearts into the cause, volunteering to help bake the 500 cupcakes that were for sale at the June 10 event, which was aptly named Cupcakes for a Cause.

The bake sale was held in the Galperins' yard at their Dollard-Des Ormeaux home, just outside Montreal. "They were staying – they weren't just buying their cupcakes and leaving," Rappoport-Galperin said of the many guests who enjoyed the bake sale. Along with the cupcakes, Lily and her family served complimentary lemonade, making for a relaxing and refreshing day outdoors.

At the end of the event, Lily and her mother decided to take the leftover cupcakes to the neighbourhood fire department. "They were so happy," said Rappoport-Galperin of the firefighters who received the treats and insisted on making a donation to the cause.

By the end of the event, Lily had raised more than $1,200 for the Make-A-Wish Foundation. "It was important because I love helping people – I always wished to do something like that," Lily said, adding that she hopes her efforts will inspire others to follow suit. "I did it because I want other people to do the same thing."

Rappoport-Galperin was happy to see her daughter taking initiative, and very pleased with how the event turned out. "Her wish came true by helping other children's wishes come true," she said of Lily.

Lily and her family are hoping to make Cupcakes for a Cause an annual event. "A mitzvah is not just a one-shot deal," Rappoport-Galperin said, adding that many of her friends and family who weren't able to come out this year are already asking about the possibility of next year's event. "We can't disappoint," she said with a laugh.

Joint bar mitzvah unites generations

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Jack Buchman, 80, stood beside his youngest grandson, Jesse, as they recited their bar mitzvah portions at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue recently, thus fulfilling the mitzvah that he was deprived of during World War II.

The octogenarian, surrounded by his wife, Roma, family and friends, has bitter memories of losing most of his family and the hunger and horrors of his near-death experiences during the war. But now he rejoices in the many blessings in his life, family, business and community involvements.

"I published the book for my family to know where I came from and who we are," he said.

The book is a panorama of events from Buchman's childhood in Warsaw, the Holocaust, his survival, starting over in France, coming to Canada, family life, successes and failures in business and community involvements. It also contains some advice to his family.

There are many photos to help make his stories more immediate. He also lists his life's "mantras," and there's a section that he calls, "Pappy's Commandments."

"My book is a tribute to the Jewish spirit of survival," he said.

Grandfather, grandson recite Torah portion

Above all, he cherishes family.

He writes of meeting "the love of my life," Roma (Rinde), also a Holocaust survivor, in Paris in 1950.

And of building a loving family in Toronto – his son, Danny, daughters, Pauline Schwartz and Annette Mincer, their spouses and 14 grandchildren. "They are the focus of my life."

His affection for his wife is still evident: "I am so proud of my wife, Roma, who continues to educate the young generation, Jewish and non-Jewish schoolchildren, on her Holocaust experiences – the experiences and the lessons to learn from the tragedy," he said.

After arriving in Canada in 1951, Jack had many jobs before he established a lumber and building supply business that prospered and became a chain of Lumber King stores.

As well, he became involved in real estate development. He retired at the age of 75.

He has participated in many charitable causes including B'nai Brith, Baycrest Foundation, Tel Aviv University and Israel Bonds. For his volunteerism, he has received several awards.

After the bar mitzvah celebrations in Toronto, 22 members of the Buchman family travelled to Israel, where the eldest and youngest Buchmans will again celebrate their bar mitzvahs at the Kotel – the Western Wall – in Jerusalem. The family will then tour Israel together. Buchman's advice to his family is: "Don't forget the past so as not to make the same mistakes in the future."

Fighting cancer with a basketball tournament

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Twenty-five-year-old cancer survivor Mark Benmoise's commitment to raising funds and awareness about the disease has earned him the designation as a Leukemia and Lymphoma Society of Canada (LLSC) Honoured Hero.

On Oct. 3, Benmoise will be joining hundreds of Torontonians for the second time on the Light the Night Walk, an event run by LLSC, which raises funds for Canadian researchers who focus on leukemia, lymphoma, myeloma, and Hodgkin's disease.

Mark Benmoise with his niece

This year, Benmoise wants to smash that total by organizing a charity basketball tournament that he hopes will help rake in at least $25,000.

The first annual Shoot 4 A Cure event, scheduled for Aug. 12 at Westmount Collegiate Institute in Thornhill, Ont., is a charity 3-on-3 basketball tournament.

He said so far, eight teams have registered and there is no limit as to how many teams can participate. Each team, made up of four players, is required to raise a minimum of $400.

"The way we set it up is that they sign up at our website (www.makeurmark.ca) and then I add them to our Light the Night team. They'll have their own personal donation page where people can go online and donate to their team," he said.

Benmoise has been fundraising for LLSC since he beat his cancer – nodular lymphocyte-predominant Hodgkin lymphoma, an uncommon subtype of Hodgkin lymphoma – last year.

He said his battle began about six years ago when he started getting violently ill.

Over the next three years, Benmoise underwent a series of CT scans, blood tests and biopsies, but it wasn't until he had surgery to remove his slightly swollen lymph nodes that they were able to give him a diagnosis.

After successful rounds of chemotherapy, Benmoise is now in remission and dedicated to offering support to the countless others who are struggling with the disease, and working towards a cure.

Benmoise joins a three-year-old girl named Isabella Leone, who is currently battling acute lymphoblastic leukemia as one of Toronto's honoured heroes. He said he's determined to live up to the LLSC's expectations.

"Part of the reason they said they wanted me to come on board was because of my positivity and my drive to raise awareness about the cause," he said.

To date, Benmoise said he's raised more than $3,600, but expects interest in his tournament to peak in the coming weeks.

The event is more than just a basketball tournament, he insists.

"We're going to have a 50-50 draw, we're going to raffle off some prizes, we're going to have a silent auction," he said.

"A DJ company called Spirit Entertainment will be offering their services and providing fun attractions like snow cone makers, popcorn machines, games, and we're looking into arranging for inflatables for the kids."

Breakfast will be provided by Bagel Stop, and Magen Boys Entertainment has also offered its services and will act as the MCs for the event.

"My goal is to try to give back, and this is the first thing I'm trying to do. I hope to make it something that people will love to come out to, while supporting a really great cause."

Finding bliss in your love relationship

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

For the past six years, I have devoted a lot of space in this column to The Wheel of Life, and what it takes to create a level of satisfaction in all areas of the wheel.

This includes your level of fulfilment in your career, as well as with money, health, friends and family, physical environment, fun and recreation, personal growth and spirituality.

The final and one of the most important wedges in the wheel, is about your significant other and how deeply satisfied you are with your partner and your relationship. There is no question that when this piece is unfulfilled, the rest of the wheel suffers as a result. So, finding your bliss in your relationship, or in looking for that relationship, is paramount to your happiness, health and well-being.

I was delighted recently to do an episode on my show Finding Your Bliss, about finding and maintaining bliss in your relationships. On the program, I was happy to have the Toronto Star's syndicated advice columnist Ellie Tesher, who offered a wealth of wisdom, wit, insight and inspiration about finding love and nurturing the love you already have. One of the most salient pieces of advice Tesher brought forth on the program was that it all begins with your relationship with yourself – when you are in a loving and healthy place with yourself, you will attract the best quality partner.

She is also a positive and optimistic person who has become a shining example of her own advice philosophy, which is that people can successfully overcome all kinds of obstacles, rise above them and inspire those around them to do so as well. She is very happily married to her second husband, and proves that love can be even better the second time around.

There's a wonderful book by psychologist Tami Kulbatski and Jeffrey Zeig called Ten Commandments for Every Aspect of Your Relationship Journey. In it, Kulbatski has a wonderful list of the Ten Commandments for Effective Communication for Couples.

Among other things, she talks about how to use clear self-expression, and my favourite one of all is: "Use a 5:1 ratio in communicating with your partner," which means for every one negative exchange, follow it up with at least five positive exchanges.

Ultimately, to find bliss in your relationship, you need to devote time to each other. According to Sarah Chana Radcliffe, author of Raising Your Kids without Raising Your Voice, it's important to make time for date nights alone once a week, without another couple, and to keep the spark alive and ignited, go away without the kids, go on mini-moons, honeymoons and spend time together.

And as American journalist and author Mignon McLaughlin once wrote: "A successful marriage requires falling in love many times, always with the same person."

OCAD U student union holds art show

Michelle Bitran
Intern

Members of OCAD University's Jewish student union had a unique opportunity to display their artistic talents as part of an art show last month.

The exhibit, held on June 21 at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto, featured the work of 11 artists from various programs at the art school. Family, friends, art teachers and the artists enjoyed refreshments while checking out the artwork.

"I think the event is important just to raise awareness in the Jewish community that there is this great school," said Liat Shalom, the chair of the OCAD Jewish student union. Shalom, 26, added that, to her knowledge, there has been only one other exhibit like this one, and it was several years ago.

She explained that the show would not only offer Jewish students exposure for their artwork, but "that it would be a good experience for the students to bond as well."

The Jewish community at OCAD is not very large – Shalom estimates it at fewer than 50 students. But, she said with a laugh, she makes it her responsibility "to go out and try to find out where the Jewish students are hiding."

The artists she brought together for the show work in diverse art forms, including painting, photography and jewelry design. While not all the art had an overtly Jewish or Israeli theme, many pieces did deal with Jewish imagery.

A second-year graphic design student, Eitan Zohar, displayed an eye-catching piece called Sheer veh Shomeah, Hebrew for "song and listener," a colour laser print that formed the Hebrew letter shin from the shapes of a microphone and headphones.

In Shalom's own works, which she created this year as a Hillel and Julie M. Gallery Emerging Jewish Artist fellow, Israel plays an important role. The illustration and animation student's pieces included an Andy Warhol-inspired diptych of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, as well as a watercolour painting of former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who was assassinated in 1995.

Among the participating artists were two other Julie M. Gallery fellows, photographer Shlomi Amiga and painter Dov Smiley.

"I feel that for most of us, we focus on subjects that in some way or another relate to our religion or our culture – it's something you can't avoid," said Shalom, who was born in Israel.

Despite the political figures that appear in her works, Shalom said her art is not meant to be political, but rather, is a result of her being affected by news from Israel while she was working on the pieces.

Julia Bernshtein, a 23-year-old environmental design student who helped organize the art show, agreed that Jewish and Israeli art doesn't have to be political. "We're talking about art here, not politics," she said.

Bernshtein, who is also Israeli, said that the exhibit will help people who are unfamiliar with Jewish artists see a different approach to art. "Judaism in general has a different mind frame and a different approach to a lot of things," she said.

Shalom said that she and Bernshtein made a point to invite many OCAD teachers to give them a chance to see "collectively, what Judaic art is."

For Bernshtein, the unique Jewish artistic attitude is centred on making works that stand out, something that certainly shone through in the exhibit. "We want to make something different, we want to make something unique."

Economist predicts end of growth as we know it

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Among economists – and politicians for that matter – "growth" is considered the gold standard for economic life. If you're a leader and your economy is not expanding, you can pretty much kiss your political career goodbye.

In the western world, most countries have experienced long-term growth, punctuated by periods of contraction, recession, stagnation and even depression. But these were states that were largely short term and were followed by periods of growth.

Not anymore, warns a prominent Canadian economist. Jeff Rubin, former chief economist and chief strategist for CIBC World Markets, is suggesting the model for growth long accepted in the west is out of date, made obsolete by high fossil fuel prices for as far as the eye can see.

Rubin believes all the "stimulus" being pumped into our economies by governments around the world can't substitute for cheap oil. Forget about growth in the five to 10 per cent range, he said; get used to one to three per cent at best.

Rubin recently put his thoughts on paper with the publication of The End of Growth, which follows his earlier bestseller, Why Your World is About to Get a Whole Lot Smaller.

While growth may be a thing of the past, he suggests there may be an upside to its demise: he's added a kicker to the book's title that asks: But is That All Bad?

With fossil fuels priced at more than $100 a barrel, consumption will inevitably come down, he predicts. And some countries, like Denmark and Japan, faced with high prices have adapted "quite successfully" to the no/slow growth environment.

These two countries, neither of which boasts any substantial oil reserves of their own, are "ahead of the curve…I think we'll find ways to live with less fuel dependency," he said.

One result of perpetually high fuel prices in North America is likely to be a flight from the suburbs. People won't be willing to commute 50-60 miles per day because it just won't be affordable any more, he said.

Another impact of high fuel prices will be on the items Canadians import from Asia. "You won't buy steel and chicken wings from China," he said. "At a certain price, what you pay to move those chicken wings offsets the price advantage….The days of frozen lamb from New Zealand could be in the rear view mirror."

Other changes are sure to follow, he continued. "In the world we're going to with $2 a litre gasoline, only the affluent will drive," he said. Expect more highways to be subject to tolls, as taxpayers shy away from paying for new thoroughfares. That will reduce traffic and people will leave their cars and switch to mass transit, he predicted. Ultimately, that can only be good for the environment, he added.

Rubin said current experience shows that even near zero interest rates and huge deficits – the stimulus he spoke about – can't overcome the limiting effects of high fuel prices. These stimulus items "only lead to speculative bubbles."

Turning his gaze south, Rubin suggested Alberta oil producers are eager to get approval of the Keystone pipeline to bring its oil to the gulf, where it will fetch $20 more per barrel than it currently does where the pipeline now ends in Oklahoma.

One way or another – whether it's the Keystone pipeline or the Northern Gateway pipeline through British Columbia – a solution will be found to get Alberta oil to the world market and the higher prices that entails, he said.

But despite the vast quantities of oil in Alberta and in other locations, triple digit prices are here to stay, he continued.

As he turns his attention to the Middle East, Rubin's glass-half-empty approach did not vary. Despite sky-high prices, $100-plus oil prices are not a panacea for the Middle East, he said.

"Population growth in the Middle East is unsustainable" and with female education at low levels, economic growth will stagnate, he said.

"Israel is going to have a lot of hungry people at its borders," he said.

Looking at the gigantic natural gas fields that lie off Israel's coast and which the country has begun to develop, Rubin cautioned against "the probability that Israel and Turkey will be on a collision course for natural gas deposits."

So is the brave new world that awaits us all bad news?

Rubin offers some solutions: "Overall, we'll need to become much more nimble in our approach to employment," with several "gigs" substituting for one well-paying job, he writes.

"What we lose in stability, we could make up in variety and shorter workweeks. Job sharing could become a more common practice" and we "will all need to be open to the idea of change."

Ultimately, however, we'll have to make do with "less stuff" "but "we'll also have more time to enjoy our lives," he states.

Israel a 'tech miracle': Google chair

Lior Kodner
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Google chair Eric Schmidt recently praised Israel's engineers, and said the company's development centres there are among the company's most efficient.

Speaking at a conference called "Big Tent," Schmidt said the quality of Israel's engineers is very high, not least due to the country's universities and the training acquired in the army. He also praised local salespeople as among the best in the world, saying they continue to contribute to the company's profits.

"We love Israel," Schmidt said, drawing applause from the crowd.

Schmidt said that Israel has a good education system and great universities, but added it needs to strengthen them further.

Schmidt said Google is constantly expanding its development centres in Israel.

He also touched on the company's recent departure from China. "We thought there would be popular demand to stop censorship," he said, adding that instead, the censorship only became more severe. "China started to censor more because she could do it," he said. "That's why we left China and started to focus on Hong Kong."

"Google is anti-censorship," Schmidt said. "As a user, you have the right to get all the information there is; in the long run, countries that block information are less competitive."

Speaking about the Arab Spring, Schmidt said "the dictators of the Arab world were censoring everything except for the Internet; they were too old and didn't know about [it]." He added that it was not the tech companies that carried out the Arab Spring, but rather people who used technology "to revolt against the dictators."

"If the government shuts down the Internet, it's a sign that the government is scared," he said.

Schmidt also spoke about innovation, saying, "If you don't try, you don't know – we tried, I and you don't even remember the names of the products that failed – that's the secret of innovation."

Asked by Haaretz if Google intends to buy a newspaper or expand its content production, Schmidt answered: "We considered many times buying a newspaper, but we decided not to, producing content is difficult; we prefer linking to the content that you are doing." "People should not be afraid of technology," Schmidt concluded. "The future is just starting."

In other developments, one of Google's main rivals, Facebook, announced it was buying Face.com, the Israeli company that provides facial-recognition technology, for an estimated sum of between $80 million and $100 million U.S.

No drug addicts among 'Zionists,' Iranian VP says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — The United Nations issued a statement saying Secretary General Ban Ki-moon once again urged Iranian officials to refrain from antisemitic statements in response to remarks at a global drug enforcement conference in Tehran by Iranian Vice-President Mohammad Reza Rahimi that seemed unusually vitriolic and inflammatory to western delegates.

"He believes it is the responsibility of leaders to promote harmony and understanding, and he deeply regrets expressions of hatred and religious intolerance," Ban's statement said.

Speaking last week, Rahimi said the Talmud, or canon of Jewish religious law, "teaches them how to destroy non-Jews so as to protect an embryo in the womb of a Jewish mother," according to excerpts published by the Fars news agency.

Mohammed Reza Rahimi

He accused "Zionists," a term the Iranian government usually applies to Israelis and their Jewish supporters abroad, of inciting drug trafficking. "You cannot find a single addict among the Zionists," Rahimi said.

Widely assumed to have the Middle East's only nuclear arsenal, Israel has hinted at pre-emptive war to prevent its arch-enemy from getting the atom bomb. Iran denies having any such designs, though its often secretive nuclear program has stoked foreign suspicion and drawn increasingly tough sanctions.

A western diplomat who was at the conference said Rahimi's 10-minute address left him "really shocked and surprised.

"We've heard speeches like this before, but this was so much worse than the usual rhetoric. This wasn't about drugs. It seems the Iranians want to create an issue and are deliberately looking to stir things up," the diplomat told Reuters on condition of anonymity.

The New York Times, which covered the conference marking a UN-sponsored International Day against Drug Abuse and Illicit Trafficking, further quoted Rahimi as saying Zionists ordered gynecologists to kill black babies and that the Russian Revolution of 1917 was started by Jews – although none, he was also quoted as saying, died in it.

The speech, at which at least 10 western diplomats were present, drew furious condemnation from Israel, which has been angered in the past by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's description of the Nazi Holocaust as a lie.

Alun Jones, spokesperson for the Vienna-based UN Office on Drugs and Crime, said UNODC attended the Tehran conference as well as related events across the world as required by the UN General Assembly, and that it could not anticipate what the Iranian hosts would say.

Jones added: "The drug trade is motivated by business and profit, not by ideological considerations, and also drug addiction is a health challenge which affects all people, of all kinds, of all race, of all creed, and it is a health challenge that affects people in the same way."

A third round of nuclear talks between world powers and Iran three weeks ago failed to resolve the stalemate. With that process seemingly close to death's door, Israel renewed veiled threats of military action against Iranian nuclear production sites, which it deems a mortal threat.

"The fact UN representatives and European delegates still attend conferences in Tehran, at which the worst kind of antisemitism is sounded, lends legitimacy to the Iranian ayatollah regime," Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said.

Iran's government, he said in a statement, is "made up not of madmen but of fanatical, antisemitic people with an agenda, who have a detailed global plan including, as they say openly and forthrightly, the destruction of the State of Israel."

Lieberman likened Iran to Hitler's Germany but said that post-Holocaust Israel would "not allow any Jew to be harmed."

He said the failure by the international community to curb the Islamic Republic's nuclear work would be "a sure recipe for disaster and a threat to world peace."

Israel reacted to the latest fruitless nuclear talks between six world powers and Iran with a well-seasoned message – sanctions must be intensified while the clocks ticks down toward possible military action.

A high-ranking Iranian general then warned that any Israeli military strikes on Iran's nuclear program would bring about the collapse of the Jewish state.

No further negotiations were planned after the June 18-19 round of talks in Moscow, and the European Union was to launch a total embargo of Iranian oil exports on July 1.

Three arrested for Yad Vashem vandalism

JTA

JERUSALEM — Three haredi men were arrested for allegedly spray-painting antisemitic and anti-Israel graffiti on the Yad Vashem Holocaust museum in Jerusalem.

The men, aged 18, 26 and 27, of Jerusalem and Bnei Brak and reportedly of the Neturei Karta group, were arrested June 26, and reportedly admitted committing the vandalism earlier this month. They are also suspected of being connected to vandalism attacks at Ammunition Hill on Memorial Day and on memorials in the Jordan Valley.

The slogans, written in Hebrew, included "Hitler, thank you for the Holocaust," "If Hitler did not exist, the Zionists would have invented him," and "The war of the Zionist regime is not the war of the Jewish people."

Yad Vashem Chairman Avner Shalev praised the quick and effective work of the police.

"I believe that it was important to know the identities of those who spray-painted the graffiti. The suspects are extremist ultra-Orthodox Jews, anti-Zionists, who are on the fringes of society, and do not represent the majority who respect the memory of the Holocaust," Shalev said. "Numerous reactions that we received from Israel and around the world, expressing condemnation and repugnance of the graffiti testify that this warped action offended many, and I hope that the court will mete out justice to the criminals."

The Neturei Karta is a group of Orthodox Jews that rejects Zionism and the establishment of the State of Israel, believing that a legitimate Israel can only be re-established with the coming of the Messiah.

Jewish groups react to U.S. health-care ruling

ITA

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court voted to uphold President Barack Obama's landmark Affordable Care Act in a 5-4 vote, with Chief Justice John Roberts voting in the majority.

The court upheld the most controversial provision of the law that required all American citizens to purchase health insurance or face a tax penalty. The court struck a provision that forced states to expand their Medicaid programs in order to cover health insurance for poverty-stricken individuals.

Jewish organizations generally praised the decision, while the Republican Jewish Coalition said it was "deeply disappointed."

Rabbi Julie Schonfeld, executive vice-president of the Rabbinical Assembly, an international association of Conservative rabbis, praised the decision, saying, "All people deserve access to affordable and equitable health-care coverage, and we join other people of faith in their staunch desire for a U.S. health-care system that offers health, wholeness and human dignity for all," she said.

"The president's vision is consistent with Jewish tradition, which is unambiguous about the requirement of a just and decent society to provide a basic level of health care," Schonfeld added.

Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, said he was "elated" with the ruling.

Reform congregations, he said, have been "at the forefront of advocacy on behalf of health-insurance reform in their states and at the national level." He cited Maimonides, noting that the medieval scholar "placed health care first on his list of the 10 most important communal services that a city should offer its residents."

Hadassah said the ruling was "affirming our commitment to ensuring that all Americans have access to quality affordable health care." The women's group had signed an amicus brief supporting the Affordable Care Act.

The ruling was a "huge victory for women and families across the country," National Council of Jewish Women CEO Nancy Kaufman said in a statement.

"The court's ruling means insurance companies may not charge women higher premiums than men," she said in her statement. "It means a wide range of preventive services important to women will be provided without co-pays or other out-of-pocket expenses, including mammograms, Pap tests, a wide range of prenatal screenings, well-woman visits, the full range of FDA-approved contraceptives, lactation consultations and supplies, and domestic violence screenings."

National Democratic Jewish Council president and CEO David Harris and chair Marc Stanley released a joint statement saying the group was "deeply gratified by today's ruling.

"We are thankful that the court affirmed the core constitutionality of this landmark legislation that will bring health care to tens of millions more Americans," they wrote.

In a statement praising the ruling, Alan van Capelle, CEO of Bend the Arc: A Jewish Partnership for Justice, offered a personal remembrance of when he was a child and his father lost his job, "and my family was afraid we might not be able to afford health insurance.

"Today's ruling means that millions of families will never again have to endure this kind of fear," van Capelle wrote.

Rabbis for Human Rights-North America also applauded the decision in a statement, emphasizing that "it is our moral duty to provide health care for all.

"We are proud that the United States has taken a major step toward guaranteeing health care for all," RHR-NA said in its statement. "We applaud President Obama, the U.S. Congress and the Supreme Court for moving us significantly closer to this ideal of guaranteeing health care for all Americans."

Republican Jewish Coalition executive director Matt Brooks in offering his disappointment on the ruling said in a statement, "The serious negative effects this law will have on the economy, on jobs, on medical research and development, and on the quality of health care in America, are very troubling."

The Orthodox Union told The CJN that it did not comment on the ruling.

Countries will share knowledge

Asked if Canada is seen as a preferred energy partner by Israel because of its longstanding support for the Jewish state, Oliver said while the Israelis are "deeply appreciative" of their Canadian ally, this is about business.

"My focus was looking at ways that could profit both countries," he said, noting that this trip was a direct result of Netanyahu's visit to Ottawa last May.

At the time, Oliver said, the Israeli prime minister told the government that the only thing Canada and Israel, as friends, could do more of was to create business opportunities.

Netanyahu, he said, wants to see Canadian-Israeli business in the energy sector make advances.

Now that Israel has found "very significant" offshore gas and onshore oil shale, Canada could leverage its years of experience in energy production and extraction technologies to deepen economic ties, Oliver said.

Various Canadian energy sector companies are already in Israel helping the country navigate its hoped-for energy boom, he said.

Another important part of the new agreement says it will see Israel and Canada strive to "reduce environmental impacts and improve practices for the responsible development and use of new sources of oil and gas supplies."

Oliver said this had implications for the science and technology sectors in both countries, which will help develop better "clean" and "green" technology for use in the energy sector.

The countries will also share knowledge and "lessons learned" during the development of their respective energy sectors on a regular basis. Details of how this would be done have not yet been worked out.

Joe Oliver meets with Oren Gadot, CEO of HelioFocus, a solar thermal technology company, in Israel last week.

Oliver said the existing Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA), which came into force in 1997, might end up being expanded as a result of the new agreement on energy between the countries.

He said CIFTA could be "deepened on the service side. There's a potential to make it more comprehensive and robust."

According to Foreign Affairs and International Trade Canada, CIFTA initially was designed to eliminate tariffs on all industrial products manufactured in Canada and Israel as well as a limited number of agricultural and fisheries products. By 2003, it was expanded to include tariff preferences on "agricultural, agri-food and fish goods."

As of 2010, bilateral merchandise trade has risen from $507.3 million in 1996 to $1.4 billion in 2010, an increase of 177 per cent.

Main exports from Canada include precious stones, paper and newsprint, machinery, electrical and electronic machinery, salt and sulphur. Imports from Israel include pharmaceutical products, electrical and electronic machinery, precious stones, scientific and precision instruments and machinery.

Currently, CIFTA doesn't have "substantive provisions in areas such as services, investment and government procurement, nor does it have parallel agreements on labour co-operation or the environment," according to Natural Resources Canada.

"It makes sense to make CIFTA more comprehensive because we want to increase our commercial relationship with Israel," Oliver said. "When Israelis think of Canada now, they can think of a good place to invest."

Canada also stands to gain more recognition as a world leader in energy management and innovation through this new agreement, Oliver said.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) commended Oliver on his mission.

"This agreement provides an opportunity to leverage Canadian expertise for the goal of Israeli energy independence. For Canada, it offers greater access to a burgeoning marketplace of both customers and innovators – both crucial for creating Canadian jobs in a fragile global economy," David Koschitzky, CIJA's chair, said in a statement.

Two states now, peace later

Arie Raif

Too many Israelis have given up on resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. They simply write it off as a Gordian knot that will forever bedevil the region. They seem reconciled to the status quo, without concern of how it's weakening Israel internally and internationally.

Israel can't afford the luxury of sitting back, hoping the Palestinians will one day become an acquiescent partner in the pursuit of peace. In the absence of any pragmatic initiative, time is not working in Israel's favour.

Despite a situation that often seems bereft of hope, despite an absence of negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, despite seemingly irreconcilable demands by both sides, the current stalemate can be overcome – provided Israel is ready to make a significant, long overdue move. Of course, it won't be easy.

"It's doable," Israeli President Shimon Peres said recently. "But if we put it off, we will roll backward instead of advancing. People understand that another war will not help. Its price will be high and its outcome low."

To claim there's no solution is ludicrous and self-defeating. It's also a self-fulfilling prophesy with no lack of right-wing pessimists ready, if not eager, to see it that way.

An interim agreement with the Palestinians is attainable by a division of land now and actual peace later, perhaps much later. It's not only possible but imperative.

Sadly, it's only after a catastrophe that Israel seems able to make painful but necessary concessions.

Guest Voice

The way forward has been evident for years now. Israel must reach an agreement with the Palestinians on two states for two peoples, if this conflict is ever to end and Israel is not to recede further into a cataclysmic morass. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu must rise to the occasion and demonstrate political courage and leadership he's not yet shown. He must remove settlements, withdraw from most of the territories and make concessions over Jerusalem.

Can he do it? The answer is yes, because he now has a huge governing majority and he's well acquainted with the "catastrophe law."

Too often in the past, only after catastrophes did Israeli governments make painful concessions for peace. Israel reached agreement with Egypt only after the Yom Kippur War, even though Egyptian president Anwar Sadat had offered prime minister Golda Meir a similar deal eight months before war erupted in 1973. The cost to Israel: 2,700 killed and a bitter taste of failure.

In 1993, prime minister Yitzhak Rabin agreed to shake Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat's hand and sign the Oslo accords only after the first intifadah.

In 2000, prime minister Ehud Barak withdrew Israeli troops from Lebanon 18 years after the 1982 Lebanon War that was supposed to last only 48 hours. The cost to Israel: 1,200 killed and a bitter taste of failure.

In 2005, prime minister Ariel Sharon withdrew Israelis from the Gaza Strip following the second intifadah.

Unmistakably, an interim Israeli-Palestinian agreement requires Netanyahu to compromise on some of his bedrock "principles." He has no choice if he wants to make peace now rather than waiting until after a catastrophe and paying more.

First, he should yield on his precondition that the Palestinians recognize Israel as a Jewish state. Do we really need their recognition? No.

Second, Netanyahu's refusal to grant the Palestinians sovereignty over five square kilometres in Jerusalem (including Temple Mount) is an unnecessary obstacle that will be regretted later.

Third, Netanyahu must overcome his resistance to evacuating settlements and reach an agreement on borders and land swaps. Without it, nobody knows which settlements will be annexed and therefore entitled to construction permits and public funds. How can the Palestinians sign an agreement with Israel without knowing where one state ends and the other begins?

Instead of bargaining with Washington about a partial, temporary construction freeze in the settlements, why not transfer to the Palestinians the settlement areas in northern Samaria that Israel evacuated as part of the disengagement plan?

Why not transfer to the Palestinians some of Area C that Israel is keeping for expanding the settlements? Forget the Gaza evacuation as an argument against withdrawal. PA President Mahmoud Abbas is not Hamas. Sharon executed the Gaza withdrawal without any agreement with the Palestinians. It served Israel's and Sharon's interests to leave the problematic territory. A master of deception, Sharon knew he needed to show "progress to Washington and improve Israel's image in world opinion. As former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger once said: Israel does not have a foreign policy, but rather a domestic policy.

It's worth remembering what Sharon told a meeting of Likud leaders, including Netanyahu, in May 2003. "Controlling 3.5 million Palestinians cannot go on forever… You might not like the word but what's happening is occupation. It's bad for Israel, bad for the Palestinians and bad for the Israeli economy."

Expanding settlements can't be reconciled with a two-state solution, which Netanyahu promised to advance. You can't justify occupation or military operations. It always looks bad, and even good public relations is pointless. War is dirty and so is the media war. You can't polish dirt. If you try, you'll only end up with dirty hands.

The United Nations will eventually recognize a Palestinian state, defined by the 1967 borders. Israel will call it "regrettable" but will eventually negotiate to prevent another catastrophe.

Arie Raif is vice-chairman of the Canadian Peres Center For Peace.

Israel Briefs

Social protests become violent

Social protests in Tel Aviv turned violent as demonstrators shattered windows and attempted to break into banks. Some 2,000 people gathered on June 23 in Habima Square protesting against socio-economic inequality as well as police violence. Eighty-five people were arrested, Ha'aretz reported. Though the police urged the indictment of some 37 of the demonstrators, the Tel Aviv Magistrates Court ordered the release of all the protesters, since none of them had a police record. The demonstration spread to banks in Tel Aviv as well as city hall. Windows were smashed in at least five bank branches, according to reports. The protesters also blocked main thoroughfares in the centre of the city. Some 24 hours earlier, 12 activists were arrested in social protests in Tel Aviv, including Daphni Leef, a high-profile activist leader.

PA columnist: Jews 'Allah's enemies'

Sheikh Taleb Al-Silwadi, a religious affairs columnist for the official Palestinian Authority (PA) daily publication, recently wrote that Jews and Israelis are "Allah's enemies," Palestinian Media Watch (PMW) reported. The "children of Zion," Al-Silwadi wrote in his weekly column, "kill, behave violently, spill blood and desecrate sacred things." According to PMW, Al Silwadi's writing follows a pattern of demonizing both Jews and Israel in the PA publication's religious section.

Hamas commander convicted

Former Hamas military commander Ibrahim Hamed was convicted of murdering 46 Israelis, Israel Hayom reported. Hamed, who was found guilty in a Judea military court, was involved in bombings at Moment Café in Jerusalem and the Pi Gilot fuel terminal, as well as at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Hillel Café and Zion Square. Israel refused to release Hamed in the exchange of 1,027 Palestinian prisoners for captive Gilad Schalit because he planned all these attacks after he was released from prison in 2001.

More illegal migrants expelled

Migrant workers from the Ivory Coast were given two weeks to leave Israel before they are arrested and deported, Israel's Interior Minister Eli Yishai said last week. Migrants who choose to leave voluntarily will receive $500 per adult and $100 per child, according to a ministry statement, the Jerusalem Post reported. There are up to 65,000 African migrants in the country, with those from the Ivory Coast numbering from a few hundred to about 2,000, according to the newspaper. Earlier last week, 150 South Sudanese migrants were deported from Israel.

Top Israeli hotels offer late-summer deals

By Steve Walz
Special to The CJN

Despite the scourge of on-again, off-again missile attacks from Gaza on the Ashkelon and Sderot regions, the terror chieftains have failed to make a dent in Israel's tourist industry, which has remained resilient throughout 2012. In fact, Israel's ministry of tourism is predicting a record-breaking year for incoming tourism that could eclipse 2010, when 3.3 million visitors entered the Jewish state.

The increased growth in tourism has created some unique challenges within the local tourism industry. During the past year, Israeli hotel managers have discovered that legions of upscale tourists are now booking their reservations much closer to their arrival dates than in the past.

"Globe-trotting customers want quick check-ins, fabulous food, Wi-Fi capability, immaculate rooms and friendly service," said Bruno DeSchuyter, general manager of the five-star Inbal Jerusalem Hotel.

"Jerusalem is still a prime destination for American tourists, and the landscape in and around our facility is an attraction as well. However, we endeavour to always be prepared to handle large numbers of last-minute bookings, while maintaining high standards of personalized services... In the Internet and smartphone age, it has become tougher to forecast what is required, so we always make sure that our staff is ready to meet any challenge," DeSchuyter continued.

"And most importantly, as more and more people are booking their reservations direct via their laptops and smartphones, we are constantly featuring special deals on our website. The fact that the readers of Condé Nast Traveler magazine selected our hotel to be placed on the 'Gold List' of elite hotels around the world, means we have absolutely succeeded in adapting to the changing needs of upscale tourists."

Rafi Beeri, the Dan Hotels' vice-president of marketing and sales, reported that American tourists are searching for both premium hospitality, as well as a myriad of travel experiences. "Jerusalem is still a prime focal point for American tourists, especially during the summer months, when many families look to celebrate bar mitzvahs at the Western Wall etc. But more and more couples and families are booking reservations in places other than Jerusalem and Tel Aviv," Beeri said.

"American tourists are booking reservations in what I would call high-quality, off-the-beaten track hotels in Herzliya [Dan Accadia], Caesarea [Dan Caesarea] and Haifa [Dan Carmel]. In fact, the Dan Carmel is well on its way towards becoming the King David Hotel of northern Israel, as we have completely renovated the hotel from top to bottom and transformed it into a luxury facility. The Dan Carmel also provides tourists with easy access to various attractions in metro Haifa and the Galilee region."

Royal Rimonim Dead Sea Club

Beeri said that American tourists come to Israel in search of something more than being greeted by a bowl of fruit in their rooms. "Both Americans and global travellers in general are looking for the quality hotels to create a 'wow' effect. This does not have to mean that hotel managers must add another apple to the fruit bowl in their room, but rather personalized services, fast connectivity via Wi-Fi, true hospitality and yes, colourful displays of delicious food in the dining room and restaurant.

"With many Americans, having a good time is not just defined by the physical amenities, either. It could also encompass who is sitting next to you in the dining room or out by the pool, where you can engage in pleasant conversation and shared experiences."

Even though the calendar says July, there are still a variety of summer deals available at many of the top hotels in Israel. Following is a listing of some of hotels that offer packages for couples and families.

Rimonim Hotels, http: English.rimonim.com

The Royal Rimonim Dead Sea recently opened its plush Royal Lounge. The lounge is situated one floor above the lobby and boasts panoramic views from a large terrace overlooking the Dead Sea. The lounge offers private breakfast and dinner, as well as light snacks and drinks throughout the day. Wine, soft drinks and hot beverages are served throughout the day and during dinner. Children are allowed to enter the lounge during meals when accompanied by their parents. The use of the lounge is offered to guests staying in the hotel's Royal and Deluxe suites. Guests staying in the hotel's Panorama rooms, Deluxe rooms and Family rooms may purchase a VIP package, which includes use of the Royal Lounge and the hotel's private VIP Spa.

Inbal Jerusalem Hotel, www.inbalhotel.com

You can book a number of summer packages via the hotel's website. July rates begin from $160 per person in a double room, based on a minimum three-night stay, while August rates vary from $160 per person in a double room based on a minimum five-night stay. There are also a variety of enticing bar/bat mitzvah packages for the entire family. In August, the hotel's popular Kid's Club will feature a supervised multimedia game room and a host of round-the-clock activities. The hotel's renowned Sofia Restaurant serves up a variety of fish and pasta dishes, as well as an assortment of unique summer dessert delicacies, prepared by executive chef Moti Buchbut.

Hotel helps make a visit to Jerusalem dreamlike

Mordechai Ben-Dat
Editor

The view from the 9th floor balcony patio of the Carmel Executive Lounge at the Dan Panorama Hotel in Jerusalem is exhilarating. It stirs the imagination. It calms the soul.

The hills and promontories outside the balcony roll south and west to the many-peopled rising heights of Judea and to the red and orange sunset that quickly fills the sky and then just as quickly disappears toward tomorrow. To the north, one looks up Keren Hayesod Street to the heart of Jerusalem's downtown core. In all, it is a wonderful sight especially when viewed while sipping a restorative cappuccino and snacking on light refreshments in the extreme comfort of the lounge. I can attest to the supreme delight of the experience as I was recently a guest at the Dan Panorama Hotel in Jerusalem and was able to relax in the lounge throughout my stay.

But relaxing was not restricted to the executive lounge. Relaxation and a sense of calm repose were the chief consequences in general of the amenities, services and helpful devotion to detail by the friendly hotel staff for the duration of my visit there.

So often in Israel, the hotel lobby is the reunion site for the urgent but tender embrace of relatives and friends who are seeing each other after long gaps in time, if not for the first time. The Dan Panorama Jerusalem's lobby is a perfect reunion site. Recently renovated, it is a warm, softly lit, WIFI accessible, wood-paneled welcoming area, with sufficient numbers of distinct configurations of chairs, sofas and tables that allow for private discussions, effusive or discrete exchanges of emotions or simply the quiet space in which to remove one's shoes after a long day of walking and exploring. The hotel bar, similarly appointed in soft light and dark tones of colour, is adjacent to the lobby and offers an additional refuge.

Dan Panorama Jerusalem Lobby

Part of the storied Israeli luxury hotel chain, the Dan Panorama Jerusalem, hews to the high standards for which the chain's 14 Israeli hotels are renowned. The hotel's famous Israeli breakfast is a cornucopia of morning delectables that encompasses an inexhaustible range of salads, cheeses, fishes, cereals and the oh-so-very-delicious offerings of different kinds of breads. Breakfast at the hotel was an activity in itself to be experienced, savoured and remembered. Should they choose, guests can rest and "recover" from the incomparable breakfast experience by stretching out on the rooftop pool. Alternatively should they wish to prepare for the next day's breakfast extravaganza, guests can exercise in the hotel's exercise room. In addition to the welcoming atmosphere of the hotel and its crowning achievement as a comfortable place of lodging, its central location sets it far above many other hotels in the city. Its location is ideal.

In all directions, the hotel is within easy walking distance of so many of the iconic historic, cultural and national sites of Jerusalem. East and a tad north, a short walk past the famous YMCA and the Dan's flagship King David Hotel, a guest can stroll to the new Mamilla promenade and the Jaffa Gate of the Old City. Heading south from the front door of the hotel, a guest can walk to the storied neighbourhood of Yemin Moshe, to see the Montefiore windmill and the artists' Mishkenot Sha'ananim. From there the walk leads past the Menachem Begin Heritage Museum, and with a short jog west to the German Colony and the trendy district of Emek Refa'im. Alternatively, the hotel guest can choose to walk north from the hotel along Keren Hayesod to the busy pedestrian mall on Ben Yehuda Street. In a very real sense, the hotel is a hub in all directions.

A stay at the Dan Panorama helps fulfil and make dreamlike a visitor's tour of Jerusalem, whether it is the first visit or the 1,000th.

By BILL GLADSTONE

NEW GENESIS PRIZE, THE "JEWISH NOBEL PRIZE," IS WORTH $1 MILLION

Described as "a Jewish Nobel Prize," a new international award has been established that will be given to Jews who gain global recognition for their exceptional achievements in the arts and sciences, the sponsoring agency of the prize announced last week.

The Genesis Prize is being financed by the Genesis Philanthropy Group, which also funds the Taglit-Birthright Israel program and other initiatives in support of Jewish identity worldwide. Genesis founder Mikhail Fridman announced the prize last week in Jerusalem with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Jewish Agency chairman Natan Sharansky.

Netanyahu will award the first prize at an annual ceremony close to Passover. "The prize symbolizes Jews' great contribution in human development and will be a source of pride for young Jews around the world," he said. Sharansky is to head the prize selection committee, which will consist of retired judges, community leaders from the Diaspora, and representatives from the Prime Minister's Office and the Genesis Philanthropy Group.

"The Genesis Prize emphasizes the contribution of the Jews to world history," Fridman said, adding that it reflects "the Jewish People's natural aspiration to improve the world and to its desire to pass its moral values on to coming generations."

John Hirsch Subject of Play: Hirsch, a new one-man show about the life of Canadian theatre legend and former Stratford Festival artistic director John Hirsch, is now in previews and opens July 12 at Stratford's Studio Theatre.

The play was conceived of by actor Alon Nashman, who performs it under the direction of Paul Thompson. It presents Hirsch as a trailblazing artist and unique personality whose mark on the world of Canadian theatre endures to this day. Hirsch was also the subject of the recent book A Fiery Soul: The Life and Theatrical Times of John Hirsch, by Fraidie Martz and Andrew Wilson, which won a 2011 Canadian Jewish Book Award.

The Hungarian-born Hirsch arrived as a Holocaust refugee in Winnipeg in 1947 and subsequently went on to found the Manitoba Theatre Centre. He became head of drama at CBC and served stints as both associate director and artistic director at Stratford. The play chronicles his life from his childhood in prewar Hungary to his premature death in 1989. www.stratfordshakespearefestival.com

Mini Theatre Review: In the summer of 1936, playwrights Moss Hart and George S. Kaufman bashed out a new play, You Can't Take It With You, in less than a month. Focusing on the eccentric but blissfully happy Sycamore family, the play's point, as Kaufman once commented, was simply "that the way to live and be happy is just to go ahead and live, and not pay attention to the world." The play enjoyed a long and successful run, and won the 1937 Pulitzer Prize for drama.

Soulpepper's impressive recent production of You Can't Take It With You seemed to reproduce this pleasing period piece in its true comic spirit, with little of the ominous big-business-is-evil overtones that crept into Frank Capra's 1938 film (starring James Stewart, Jean Arthur and Lionel Barrymore). Many critics contend that You Can't Take It With You, which was Moss and Kaufman's third and most effortless collaboration, set the tone for modern American comedy and even television sitcoms, with its quick one-liners and set-up situations rooted in character and real feelings.

Soulpepper presents four more outstanding classics in its summer season: David Mamet's Speed-the-Plow, Neil Simon's The Sunshine Boys, Mikhail Bulgakov's The Royal Comedians (Molière), and Arthur Miller's The Crucible. www.soulpepper.ca

For Mexican filmmaker, art imitates life in The Prize

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

As Mexican filmmaker Paula Markovitch can attest, childhood experiences can linger on for years and insinuate themselves into your soul.

In her debut feature film, The Prize, which screened at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival, Markovitch drew on her past for inspiration.

"It is a film about memory," she said. "Not about the facts that happened, but as I remember them."

The Prize is set in Argentina – where she was born – in the 1970s. The military, having staged a coup d'etat, launched a violent campaign to rid the country of left-wing dissidents.

During the Dirty War epoch (1976-83), Argentina was under siege as people disappeared, never to be seen again. There was fear in the air as the rule of law fell by the wayside.

Amid this uncertainty, Lucie Adelstein, a dissenter, and her seven-year-old daughter, Cecelia, flee Buenos Aires for a life of self-imposed exile in a remote corner of Argentina.

They live in a simple cabin on the sand dunes of a desolate stretch of beach facing a raw sea. "We're here because they want to find us," says Lucie.

Lucie, played by Laura Agorreca, keeps a low profile, rarely venturing from the safety of the beach. She is so fearful of being arrested that she instructs Cecelia (Paula Galinelli Hertzog) to lie, to tell schoolmates that her mother is a housekeeper and that her father is a curtain salesman.

Lucie's efforts to conceal their identity seem threatened when Cecelia wins the first prize in an essay contest sponsored by the Argentine army. In her essay, Cecelia writes that soldiers killed her older cousin, a tipoff that may imperil their lives.

The Prize is based on real incidents, said Markovitch, 44, who settled in Mexico when she was 22.

"We lived on the beach," she said. "But not only my mother and me. My father lived with us. The absence of my father in the film makes it more appealing."

Markovitch's parents were artists and socialists who moved in intellectual circles and opposed the junta.

Paula Markovitch

During this grim era, when human rights were regularly flouted by the regime, virtually anyone with ideals and convictions could be kidnapped, tortured and murdered, she observed.

"We all lived in fear," said Markovitch, "Not only political activists. Everyone. No one was exempt. The entire society was affected."

Markovitch, whose grandparents were Polish Jews from Warsaw who arrived in Argentina after World War I, emigrated after the restoration of democracy. "I left for personal reasons, without my family, after the dictatorship ended."

Starting in the mid-1990s, she began writing scripts for Mexican films and television shows. "I have been a writer since I was a child. My fascination with film comes from literature."

Markovitch made two short films before making The Prize.

Much to her satisfaction, it has been accepted at a succession of movie festivals, including the Jerusalem Film Festival, and has been positively received by critics and audiences alike.

But The Prize is not the first film about the subject of the Dirty War.

"There have been many films about that period," she said, noting that when a crime is committed and pain is inflicted, filmmakers gravitate toward that topic.

Rabbi takes musical to Off-Broadway

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rabbi Pinny Gniwisch has seen the abject poverty and violence of Brazil's cities first hand. As a Chabad rabbi, he has travelled to Rio de Janeiro where millions live in shantytowns that teem with homeless children, exploited and sometimes callously murdered.

The father of six always felt helpless.

Never did he imagine that he might one day be able to do something to bring the plight of these people to wider attention, nor that he would be cast in the role of theatrical producer – on Broadway, or, at least, very close to it.

Rabbi Gniwisch is the producer of Rio, a new musical play written by Montrealer Mitch Magonet in collaboration with Joey Miller of Toronto.

Magonet was an adult student of Rabbi Gniwisch's at the Chai Centre and an aspiring young composer who played music by ear when he came to the rabbi eight years ago with a song from a musical he was working on.

"I was so moved and captured by the raw emotional power and energy, at that moment, I made a commitment to Mitch to do whatever possible to help get this musical off the ground and onto a stage," Rabbi Gniwisch said.

That moment will finally come when Rio premieres July 10 at the New York Musical Theatre Festival, the first of six performances at St. Clements Theater on West 46th Street. It was one of 23 full productions chosen from among 400 entries. The annual festival is a showcase for promising new works, and has been the launching pad for many productions that went on to Broadway.

Inspired by Charles Dickens' Oliver Twist, Rio is the story of 12-year-old street kid Pipio, who desperately searches for his birth mother among the gangs and drug lords that rule Rio's modern-day favelas.

These slums also have their colourful characters and exotic locales, and the play captures the carnival atmosphere amid the squalor. Ultimately, the message is hopeful.

"There is both joy and sorrow in the rhythms of the people of Brazil," Magonet explained. "That's what we wish to capture: the relentless beat that drives these people to survive."

All this is to be accomplished with a cast of 12 Equity performers, headed by young Nicholas Gonzalez.

Rio is timely: many of these slums are being cleared and their inhabitants dispersed as Rio de Janeiro prepares to host the 2016 summer Olympics.

"As the father of six children, who are blessed daily with running water, an education and a family who loves them, I could not imagine them living without that," Rabbi Gniwisch said. "And yet for thousands of homeless children in Rio, that is the only life they know."

Besides its commercial potential, Gniwisch sees the play as an opportunity to bring about change, to fulfil the Jewish commandment of tikkun olam.

"Hopefully, Rio will shine a light on what is happening there," he said, and shake Brazilians out of their indifference at a time when they are sensitive to international opinion as the Olympics approach.

Until now, the rabbi's theatrical experience has been limited to Chabad's walk-through productions for schoolchildren at holiday times including Maccabees and Exodus, the latter drawing 8,000 spectators.

His job has been to market Rio and find the money to mount it. Although most of the team is donating its time, he is still short $10,000 for basic costs.

Rio has attracted some heavy hitters in New York. The director is Scott Faris, who just did William Shatner's one-man show Shatner's World: We Just Live in it, while Broadway veteran Jack DePalma has been guiding Magonet and Miller as creative consultant. The choreographer is Kate Dunn, who was assistant choreographer for Billy Elliot.

Interactive whodunit features local actor

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Toronto actor Danny Wengle is the lead investigator in Apprentice to Murder, a hilarious, interactive murder mystery now running at Mysteriously Yours Mystery Dinner Theatre.

Based on the popular TV reality show, this interactive whodunit features "The Donald," played by Ken MacDougall, and a mixed bag of celebrities.

Wengle explains that his job as Regis Fildin, the investigator, involves helping the audience understand what's going on, as well as helping the audience solve the crime.

He says audiences will have a great night of fun. "We use from 20 to 30 audience members in any given performance and give them some lines or a situation. We are unpredictable enough, but when you pick people just out of the audience, it can go a wide variety of ways."

This being live theatre, anything can happen, such as the time Wengle had a bad bout of hiccups just as he was about to sum up the plot and bring it to a conclusion.

Danny Wengle at *Mysteriously yours

"I thought if I timed it just right, I could breathe and they wouldn't know I had the hiccups, but after a few minutes, the only way to go was to tell the audience I had the hiccups and see who had a cure," he says.

"So, instead of being a 15-minute summation, it went on for 45 minutes, where somebody wanted me to stand on my head, someone else tried to hypnotize me, and another person sneaked up behind me and tried to scare me. Afterwards, people wondered if that happened every night."

Wengle says Mysteriously Yours provides something that other theatres don't provide, in terms of silliness and just having a good time. He says he sees the fun in the audiences' faces. Unlike bigger theatres, there is an intimacy with the audience because the actors perform around the tables and not from a stage.

Wengle is no stranger to sleuthing. He joined the company in its infancy 25 years ago and, after a 15-year absence, returns to the scene of the crime! It was with the encouragement of his two sons, Jonah, 15, and Ben, 11, who loved a Mysteriously Yours show Wengle took them to, that he decided to return to the murderous fold.

Because the Toronto theatre, on Yonge Street south of Eglinton Avenue, is only blocks away from his home, he has plenty of time to spend with his kids and wife, Sharonah, a doctor. Coincidentally, he met her after one of Mysteriously Yours' early productions at the Royal York Hotel. She was on a date, but that didn't stop Wengle from barging in.

Wengle, who is also a writer and sound designer, comes from an entertainment family. His late grandfather, Abraham Fox, and his uncles worked in the film industry, and his extended family includes actors and musicians. Wengle caught the acting bug at a young age, having been exposed to a many classic movies by his family. He first channelled his love of acting into a play at a Jewish camp.

He has appeared in Huron Country Playhouse's production of Rumors; Lover's and Madmen's Kvetch; Sunshine Festival's Dial M for Murder and White Line Fever's Girls We Have Known. His television and feature-film credits include Doc; Exhibit A; Booze Can and A Whisper to a Scream.

Apprentice to Murder runs at Mysteriously Yours Mystery Dinner Theatre, at 2026 Yonge St., until Sept. 15. For tickets call, 416-486-7469 or visit www.mysteriouslyyours.com.

American anthropologist portrays Jews in Turkey

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Turkey's venerable Jewish community, one of the few still left in the Muslim world today, comes under rigorous scrutiny in Marcy Brink-Danan's Jewish Life in 21st-Century Turkey: The Other Side of Tolerance, published by Indiana University Press.

The author, a Brown University anthropologist, provides readers with a clear, comprehensive survey of a model minority.

Jews have lived in Turkey for more than 2,000 years, but the vast majority of its Jewish citizens are the descendants of 15th-century persecuted Spanish Jews who were offered asylum in the Ottoman Empire by a visionary sultan.

Jews in Turkey have enjoyed full citizenship since the formation of the secular Turkish Republic in 1923, "yet their patriotism and indigenousness are regularly questioned by Muslim Turks," she observes.

She adds, "Jews in their everyday interactions with Muslim Turks are regularly assumed to be foreigners who are either recently arrived or on their way to somewhere else."

Despite their Turkish citizenship and their full integration into Turkish society, they are regarded as yabanci (strangers or foreigners), she claims.

However viewed by Muslims, Turkish Jews were never forced to live in ghettos and were never persecuted in a wholesale manner, she points out.

During the Ottoman era, they were a tolerated minority, like Christians, and since the advent of the republic, they have been full citizens.

Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the republic's generally revered founder, had a high regard for Jews, praising them for their loyalty and assuring them that they would live in "comfort and happiness" in Turkey.

According to Brink-Danan, Turkish Jews have served the state in at least one important respect: "The Jews, in the role of the 'good minority,' serve as a powerful foil to the Armenian genocide discourse, enabling Turkey to display a history of cosmopolitanism and refute the bad press it so often garners over the genocide question."

Judging by a survey she cites, most Turkish Jews consider themselves quite religious. Yet many of the Jews she encountered regard themselves as devoutly secular, in line with the tenets of the republic.

Given their Spanish ancestry, Turkish Jews are predominantly Sephardi, with surnames such as Amado and Ventura. And, of course, many elderly Turkish Jews speak Judeo-Spanish, or Ladino, a dying language that incorporates elements of Hebrew, Aramaic, Turkish, French, Italian and Greek.

Nonetheless, she notes, some Jews have Turkified their names, while others have replaced old names with purely Turkish names.

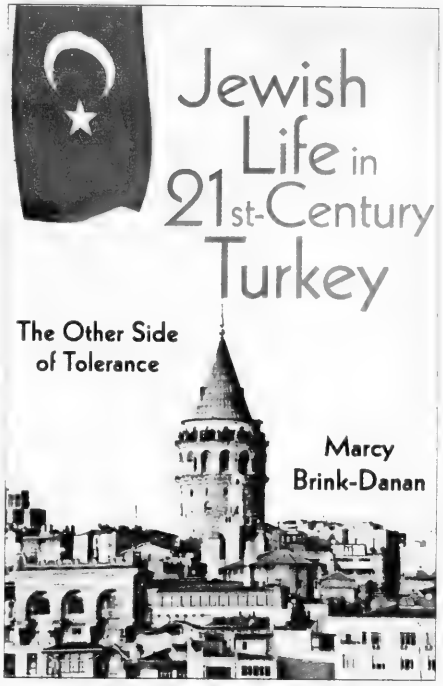
More than 90 per cent of Turkey's 18,000 Jews live in urban areas, primarily in Istanbul, but also in Ankara, Bursa and Adana.

Before the emergence of Israel, Turkey was home to a much larger Jewish community. In her estimation, one-third of its members have emigrated since the advent of Israeli statehood.

In references to the "strong infrastructure" that underpins the community in Istanbul, she mentions its network of synagogues, schools and so on. But in almost the same breath, she suggests that this is a community in decline, given its low birthrate, aging population and mixed marriages.

"If prior to the 1960s intermarriage was quite rare, by 1992 marriages between Jews and non-Jews in Turkey was recorded at 42 per cent, with the rate of intermarriage nearly doubling between 1990 and 2001," she writes.

In her view, the Jewish community lives with contradictions. As she puts it, "Jews in Turkey publicly celebrate a long history of coexistence and tolerance, yet live with ongoing security concerns bred by antisemitism and periodic attacks against… their institutions." This, of course, is a reference to the three assaults that have been mounted against Neve Shalom synagogue in Istanbul by Islamic fanatics since 1986.



Brink-Danan suggests that Jews in Turkey keep a low profile, with the community being extremely reluctant to publicize its activities. "The consensus is that the slightest publicity might endanger the status quo."

She goes on to say: "Throughout my fieldwork research, my Turkish Jewish friends advised me to follow their example and erase my own Jewishness from the public sphere, citing a list of 'don'ts' that sometimes seemed endless: don't nail your mezuzah to the outside of the doorframe; don't wear a Jewish star necklace, and, just in case, don't tell your landlord you are Jewish.

"I constantly confronted the seemingly ironic claim Turkish Jews make of feeling at home in a country where Jewish difference is maintained in the private domain, while public space is seen as a universal sphere in which difference must be erased.

"Becoming Turkish, along with the fear of not being perceived as Turkish enough, has engendered a profusion of effacing social practices among Jews in Istanbul. Layered upon these assimilationist conditions, local antisemitism and the complicated relationship Turkish Jews have with Israel… generate an additional set of incentives to disappear."

The lack of signage at all major Jewish community buildings in Istanbul is also a function of this mindset, she says.

Public support for Israel among Turkish Jews falls into the category of "the forbidden." As she writes, "While opinions and emotions about Israel run deep among Jews in Turkey, I rarely observed a Turkish Jew advocating for Israel, or for that matter heavily criticizing Israel."

Brink-Danan, in Jewish Life in 21st-Century Turkey, ventures beyond the bland and the predictable and produces a thought-provoking book about an intriguing Jewish community in a fascinating Muslim country.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

Meiron Blackstien makes hand-crafted guitars

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Typically, the vast majority of acoustic and electric guitars for sale in stores today are made in anonymous factories like so many sausages rolling off assembly lines. A select few, however, are individually hand-crafted.

Meiron Blackstien, born in Toronto and raised in Israel, is an old-fashioned craftsman who makes custom-made guitars one by one, turning out each guitar with love, care and skill.

A young and upcoming luthier on the Toronto musical scene, he is the founder and proprietor of Six String Garage, located in the humming heart of Kensington Market, a stone's throw away from his father's birthplace.

Blackstien and his parents made aliyah in 1985, settling in Givat Shmuel, the home of his Israeli mother, Tami.

He left Israel after completing his national service as a teacher's assistant, leaving behind his parents and younger brother, Gal. "I didn't think there were too many opportunities for me in Israel to be what I wanted to be."

Now 28, Blackstien is, so to speak, a rebel with a cause. "They told me you can either build or repair guitars. They said you can't do both."

He has proven the skeptics wrong. Blackstien repairs guitars and builds them from scratch in his second-floor shop. He has built one acoustic guitar and four electric guitars so far and hopes to make 30 to 50 guitars each year once he is fully established.

"But I'll probably never stop taking repairs," he said. "They keep me thinking. No two repairs are the same. Repairing a guitar is a great problem solver, and it pays the bills."

He was initiated into the world of guitars by his father, Gary, a dentist and guitar aficionado.

"We had guitars all over the house," Blackstien said in a reference to their home in Givat Shmuel, a small town near Tel Aviv.

Before he reached his teens, he took piano lessons, but disliked the instrument so much that he dropped out of music altogether.

At 12, he gravitated toward the guitar and was immediately captivated by it.

"I don't exactly know why the guitar was appealing," he said. "It's a mystery. But the guitar is a cultural icon. It's accessible, and you don't have to be a dedicated musician to get into it. I just thought the guitar was really cool."

Meiron Blackstien's shop is in the heart of the Kensington Market.

Blackstien, tall and lanky, began taking guitar lessons and was hooked. Although he plays double bass in a local band, Christian D and the Hangovers, he still takes guitar lessons.

Blackstien started tinkering with guitars shortly after he started playing one at home. "The guitars I had access to were cheap and required adjustments. I did my homework and figured out the basics."

Having become a guitar fanatic, he enrolled in the Roberto-Venn School of Luthiery in Phoenix, Ariz., in 2003. And in a bid to upgrade his budding skills, he apprenticed with Joe Veillette, an accomplished guitar-maker, in Woodstock, N.Y.

He then joined the service department of Steve's Music Store in Toronto as a guitar technician.

With the help of a government loan, he opened his own shop, Six String Garage, in the Parkdale district in 2010, but he did not fare too well in his first venture as an independent businessman. "I wasn't getting enough traffic, and the rent was too high," he explained.

Last September, he moved to Kensington Market, a neighbourhood brimming with garment and food stores and Asian arts and crafts shops.

"It was very slow for the first few months. It took time for people to find me again. But this is a much more convenient area and easier for customers to reach."

His clientele consists of hobbyists and professional musicians.

Hobbyists come in once or twice a year for what is known in the trade as the guitar setup, a process encompassing adjustments and cleaning to optimize performance.

He also teaches a course in guitar setup. "It's not a complicated procedure, but it can be intimidating if you don't know what you're doing."

Professional musicians need setups as well, but they're usually looking for custom options and enhanced upgrades.

In the future, Blackstien hopes to spend the bulk of his time making guitars. It takes him about 200 hours to build a guitar, for which he charges up to $3,000.

"What I do is very unique in terms of design, hardware and engineering," he said. "I don't copy an existing shape."

Meiron Blackstien stands in front of guitars he built by hand.

Blackstien's guitars, adorned with plastic components, are carved from fine woods. He uses alder for the body, apple for the neck and ebony for the fretboard.

When he is working on the body, weight, cosmetic appeal and workability are the key factors. When he gets to the neck and fretboard, the issues that concern him are strength and sonic characteristics.

His ultimate objective is always the same: to build a clean, simple guitar.

In his view, patience and humility are the hallmarks of a good craftsman.

"You have to realize there is a constant learning curve and always room for self-improvement," he explained. "You also have to have a good eye for detail and shapes. Cosmetic appeal is important, too. And you need a good ear. It's the test of what we do."

Despite his formidable skills, he has to struggle to survive.

"It's a very tough market to break into," said Blackstien, whose local competitors number in the dozens. "You're asking for a lot a money for a custom-built guitar."

Nonetheless, he aspires to be a paragon in Toronto's community of guitar builders.

Two Jewish players chosen in NHL Entry Draft

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Two Jewish players – one from Nepean, the other from Winnipeg – were among 211 young skaters chosen last week in the 2012 NHL Entry Draft.

Both were taken in the third round; first to go was Oshawa Generals goalie Daniel Altshuller, selected by the Carolina Hurricanes 69th overall. He was the sixth goaltender chosen. A few picks later, Nashville Predators chose forward Brendan Leipsic, a skater with the Portland Winter Hawks, 89th overall.

Both attended development camps for their pro teams last week.

Altshuller has been on scouts' radar for some time. Though he played Tier II junior hockey for his hometown Nepean Raiders, he was the starting goalie for the OHL-dominated Team Ontario in the World Under-17 tournament two winters ago. Playing all games, he led the team to a gold medal victory.

Later he did the same as Canada's number one goalie at the Ivan Hlinka Memorial Under-18 Tournament, being named player of the game in the final contest.

He spent the last season in the OHL with the Generals and in 30 games, the 6-foot-3, 190-pound netminder registered a .900 save percentage and a goals-against average of 3.55.

He recently attended Maccabi Canada's tryout camp for the team it will send to the Maccabiah Games in Israel next summer.

Leipsic, the Winnipeger, plays much bigger than his five-foot-eight 175-pound frame would suggest. He's considerably under-sized by today's NHL standards, and didn't even rate in Central Scouting's mid-term rankings. In its final placements, he was rated 114th among North American skaters, which should have seen him drafted somewhere in the later rounds.

"I didn't expect to go this high but Nashville called a couple of times and I knew there was interest and then they traded up to get me – it's great to know they like you that much," Leipsic said.

In 65 games with the Winterhawks, the left winger bulged the twine 28 times and added 30 assists. He added seven goals and eight assists in 20 playoff games. He also spent 82 minutes in the penalty box during the regular season.

If that sounds like a smaller guy playing big – a "shift disturber" in hockey parlance – his coach would agree. "Brendan is an energy guy," said Winterhawks head coach and GM Mike Johnston. "When he's emotionally and physically engaged in the game, he sets the bar for the rest of the guys.

Brendan Leipsic

"If he's going to go out and take on 6-foot-2, 200-pound defenceman at his size, then you better expect your other guys to follow," Johnston is quoted saying on the OregonLive website.

"I only know one way to play and that's playing with energy. Being a smaller guy, you've got to compete as hard as you can and go to those hard areas of the ice. I've always played physical ever since I started playing hockey, so ... that's what I do," Leipsic said.

Before he chose Leipsic in the WHL draft, Johnston consulted Craig Heisinger, a Manitoba hockey maven and today assistant manager with the NHL Jets, who told him, "You've got to take him. This kid, I guarantee you, he'll play for you. He is the most competitive kid I've ever seen. And I don't care what size he is, he has skill and he competes."

Preds GM David Poile told the Winnipeg Free Press, "He's a little bit [Jordin] Tootoo-ish, a little bit Brad Marchand. I'm sure that the best description would be that he's not fun to play against, probably the opposition doesn't like him too much. This is the guy you love but they hate. Not big in stature but plays really tough."

Leipsic will play for Team Canada at the 2012 Canada-Russia Challenge in August. The Canadian team includes blue chip NHL prospects Mark Scheifele, Mathew Dumba, Morgan Rielly, Griffin Reinhart, Ryan Murray and Jonathan Huberdeau – the cream of the cream of Canadian junior players, many of them first-rounders.

He was recently named Manitoba Jewish Athlete of the Year.

There were plenty of juicy rumours circulating at the draft in Pittsburgh. At one point, the buzz was that the Penguins' Jordan Staal would be dealt straight up for Carolina Hurricane's young sniper, Jeff Skinner. In the end, Staal did go to the 'Canes, but for three players, including centre Brandon Sutter.

"I think Pittsburgh did extremely well," said Alex Voihanski, who attended the draft.

Voihanski, who is head of JCC Chai Sports, is also general manager of International Scouting Services (ISS), an agency that provides members of the media and NHL teams scouting reports on players from around the world.

Looking at some 2012 selections, Voihanskis said the Maple Leafs did well with the fifth overall pick, Morgan Rielly, who might well be the best defenceman in the draft. But their second selection, Guelph defenceman Matt Finn, was a steal. "We had him as a pretty high prospects in the first round," he said. "We were shocked he was available in the second round and so was Toronto."

As for Pittsburgh's first pick, Derrick Pouliot, which they received from Carolina in the Staal deal, Voinahski said, "I'm not crazy about him. I frankly think they should have taken [Jacob] Trouba."

Trouba was selected one pick later, ninth overall, by the Winnipeg Jets. Voihanski calls him "a rock solid player. He could make the Jets out of camp."

Montreal "had the best draft of any team," he continued. Alex Galchenyuk is a top talent and their second pick, Swedish winger Sebastian Collberg, "is really talented. He has speed, a nose for the net... We had him rated in the first round."

As for Carolina's selection of Altshuller, "I emailed him and wished him a mazel tov.

"He's big and technically sound. When he grown into his body, he'll be scary, he's that good."

Tories favour private health care: Fry

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal health critic Hedy Fry suggested that the Harper government is undermining a 10-year accord with the provinces to press an agenda that favours private health care.

Fry, a physician and former president of the B.C. Medical Association, was a guest speaker at the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors June 27 on the topic "Ensuring the Future of Medicare: The Role of the Federal Government."

Fry said that medicare, as it has been known since the 1960s, is in jeopardy because of the majority the Conservative party holds.

She said the government has done nothing to see that the agreement on health-care funding, signed in 2004 by Liberal prime minister Paul Martin and the provinces and territories, is implemented as was foreseen at the time.

The money involved, totalling $41.2 billion, is continuing to be transferred to the provinces and territories, but there is no longer any oversight of how it is spent and whether the agreement's objectives are being met, she said.

"If I wanted to be cynical, I would say, in 2014, the government is going to throw up its hands and say, 'You see, we tried, the system isn't working, going private is the answer,'" Fry said.

The aim of the infusion of new cash from Ottawa was to encourage more community-based health services and move away from the traditional focus on medical care delivered in hospitals, she said.

"Today, it's not only doctors who can deliver health care, and a hospital is not usually the best place to be cared for, unless the situation is acute and specialized care is needed," she said.

To ensure the sustainability of medicare, Fry said, the emphasis must be on multi-disciplinary community or home-based services. It's less costly and, in most cases, better for the patient, especially those with chronic ills.

Some provinces have moved in this direction, but others have failed to do so, and may be using the federal money "to pave the streets," she said. "The provinces have been left on their own."

Mechanisms were put in place to track the accord's progress in reaching its goals, she said. These were abandoned with the election of the Conservatives in 2006, and Prime Minister Stephen Harper has never met with the premiers and territorial leaders to discuss it, she said.

Hedy Fry

The wealthier provinces may be able to improve the health-care system, but the others probably won't, and will likely cut services, because raising taxes in economic hard times is not an option, Fry said. The result, she said, will be varying levels of care from province to province, something the Canada Health Act did not envision.

In addition, the 2004 accord foresaw the introduction of pharmacare and the licensing of doctors and nurses to work in any province, but no headway has been made on these points either, she said.

Fry, the member for Vancouver Centre since 1993, said medicare was the main reason she, a native of Trinidad and Tobago, immigrated to Canada from Britain in 1970.

She and her husband had become disillusioned with the deterioration of the national health system in Britain, caused, she believed, by the privatization of some services.

Having had parents with very limited means (the family lived in social housing until she was 13), Fry, 70, said she understood early on the unfairness of linking income to health-care access.

She warned that under a U.S.-style private system, those who have chronic illnesses requiring expensive treatment may find themselves uninsurable, even if they are able to pay ever-escalating premiums.

Toronto lawyer pens book about African peace project

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When Adam Hummel travelled to Kenya in 2008 for a three-week volunteer trip, he never anticipated he'd become the founder of a peace project and author of a book based on his experience.

Yet last month, Hummel, a 26-year-old commercial litigation lawyer, appeared at Toronto's Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) to promote his self-published book, Amani Haki Yetu: Peace is Our Right.

"I tried to write a book about what life is like in Kenya, following the post-election violence there in 2008 and how people have reacted to it and what they're trying to do towards the next elections," Hummel said, adding that 100 per cent of the proceeds from the sale of the book go to funding for projects under the banner of Youth Ambassadors for Peace (YAP), the non-profit he founded four years ago.

He explained that during his volunteer mission to a village in Kenya called Kiptere in 2008, he learned that shortly after the December 2007 Kenyan general elections, a civil war broke out, leading to the murder of about 1,300 people and the displacement of about 600,000 others.

He said the root causes of the violence were tribalism, which is akin to racism, and idleness in the farming communities, where there are no programs in place to occupy the youth.

Instead of throwing money at the problem when his trip ended, Hummel, who had experience running programs as a former Hillel president at York University, committed to starting a soccer tournament in Kenya to bring together rival tribes – Kalenjin, Kisii and Luo – for the first time since the violence erupted following the 2007 elections.

Hummel decided to put a foundation in place to create a shared understanding of history, values and culture between tribes, and help the idle youth turn away from negative influences such as drugs and violence.

By keeping in touch with his contacts on the ground in Kenya and travelling back there twice more, Hummel has built an organization that is responsible for developing an unofficial peace treaty that was endorsed by government officials, a drama club that was created to advocate for peace through the arts, and a poultry project that involves raising chickens and donating the eggs to people who are newly diagnosed with HIV/AIDS.

He also organized a peace workshop, which was run with the help of a friend named Courtney Toretto, to educate the local tribes about their shared values.

Years later, YAP continues to thrive.

"At first, this was a small project based in one area, but we've been able to expand into another part of the country... to include more tribes," Hummel said, adding that the Kikuyu tribe, which is considered the dominant tribe in Kenya, has accepted the organization.

Kepha Nyambegera, YAP's regional director, was a participant in the first peace workshop the organization held, and he is now running his own peace workshop with the Maasai and Kikuyu tribe members.

The newest initiative, called the Roadshow, is meant to take a proactive approach to the upcoming Kenyan general elections slated for March 2013.

"What [Nyambegera] does is rent a van, put a speaker on top and drive through different towns playing music and trying to get people to come speak to him. The goal of these roadshows is to get people to think about what they will do during the next elections," Hummel said.

The main goal, he added, is to urge people to resist the calls to violence.

"We want people to start thinking about, what if suddenly violence erupts again and weapons are handed out and politicians start coming around to encourage it?

From left, Robins Ochieng, Adam Hummel, Courtney Toretto, and Kepha Nyambegera, the regional director of YAP programs

"In the last election, the youth sort of just went along with it. They were given a little bit of money and encouraged to go fight each other, and that's how things broke down. So if we can show them that doing that is completely unproductive and would be going backwards, we can give them ideas of what they can do."

He said many people continue to suffer from the post-election violence of 2008, still living in internally displaced person (IDP) camps.

"It shocked me to see that the people living in the camp were elderly, and that when I asked them what kind of a donation they wanted, they asked for enough sugar for all of them, which would have cost about $15. That experience showed me the true impact of the conflict, the will of these few elderly individuals to push forward, and also how such a little bit of money can go such a long way to helping."

But Hummel's approach is to inspire people to avoid more violence rather than work on picking up the pieces following another conflict.

He said the peace treaty they drafted in 2009, which can be found on the YAP website (www.kenyapeaceproject.com) and as an appendix in his book, will be blown up to the size of billboards and will be posted around the towns.

"We'd like to get the leaders and mayors to endorse it and commit to the peace treaty," he said.

Hummel, who will return to Kenya for a short trip later this month, said he plans to follow up with the volunteers and make sure the programs are running smoothly.

"Sometimes I feel like we've bitten off more than we can chew because we've tackled so many different things," he said.

But a main source of motivation for Hummel is YAP's involvement with the Victory Primary School, a school that serves about 190 kids, most of whom are either orphans or have lost a parent to political violence or HIV and AIDS.

Hummel details his first visit to the school in his book.

He said when he arrived at the school, which was made of "literally just wood and tin," he was moved by the students' positive attitudes despite the hardships they endure.

Hummel's brother, Justin, was even moved to run a fundraiser for the school. He collected $750 from his fellow students, which paid for a new classroom, soccer balls, clocks for each room, books, and a special holiday meal for the students. He also arranged for each student at the school to receive a hand-written card.

"I believe that the Victory Primary School represents a hope and potential for change," Hummel wrote in his book.

"Despite what these students have endured, and despite their current circumstances of eating a small lunch that is donated, and walking five kilometres to school every day, they smile, they laugh, they're happy and they have dreams."

Cut the apron strings

Dear Ella,

My son David just graduated from university, and my husband Paul and I are very proud – sort of. I'm not sure yet, but I'm afraid David might follow in his brother's footsteps. Adam, my oldest, graduated from university two years ago, and he has done nothing with his life since.

We threaten to throw him out all the time, but deep down he knows we wouldn't do it. Paul and I argue a lot about Adam. Paul blames me for not being stronger. Sometimes Paul comes home from work and sees Adam just rolling out of bed. Adam is too comfortable with his life at home, and I don't see this ending any time soon. He can't keep a girlfriend, as no girl would want him like this.

Now I am worried about David. Adam is a horrible role model and David is talking about travelling this year instead of looking for work. He's worked part time since high school and has saved his own money. I don't think it's such a terrible idea, but I'm afraid he will lose opportunities.

I'm scared for my boys and don't know where to turn. Help!

Mother of Lazy Loafers

Dear Mother of Lazy Loafers,

The reasons parents get into this situation are numerous and often quite deep. Whatever led to it, you are now forced to deal with the present. I suspect you already have a good idea of what needs to happen, but obviously you are not prepared to throw Adam out or you would have done that already. You will, however, have to grow a thicker skin if you truly want to help him. He is taking advantage of you and you are falling for it. Instead of helping, you are crippling him and preventing him from facing his real problems, which will escalate the longer he is allowed to continue in this lifestyle.

Where is Adam getting his money to go out? Where is he getting his clean clothes and meals? I'll bet he has a computer with Internet and a cellphone too. There's a big difference between helping and enabling.

You need to force Adam to live his own life. Start by devising a plan together that you will both stick to. He needs a goal and you need a deadline. Assist by guiding him through the plan point by point. Make sure it's realistic, but do not create it for him. Adam needs to take responsibility for his own life by becoming independent. If he falls along the way, you can pick him up, brush him off and push him forward again. By coddling him you are reinforcing his fears and insecurities.

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

What it boils down to is guilt. You will feel guilty if you force your child out. By allowing yourself to be ruled by guilt, you are enabling his destructive lifestyle. You must put your son ahead of your own feelings of inadequacy, of thinking you are a bad mom. Adam must take that first step to prove to himself that he can do this. Give him that little push out of the nest and watch him fly. You'll be proud you did.

And don't let Adam's lifestyle affect David's goals. From the sound of it, David has had this plan all along and he's worked for it. Allow him to make his own choices. Time to cut those apron strings.

Film portrays Margaret Thatcher's dementia

It happens every once in a while, and I can usually anticipate where the conversation is going. A family member of a patient who is experiencing the progression of their dementia starts the conversations with the words, "Surely, in this world of modern medicine, there is something more we can do to halt the decline in my mother" or father or other loved one.

Sometimes there is a sense of accompanying anger, sometimes anguish and sometimes a degree of aggressiveness as if somehow I, in my role as a geriatrician, might be reluctant to try something novel or be ignorant of a new discovery. Sometimes the question is accompanied by a package of Internet-based articles on "new or experimental" treatments for dementia, ranging from megavitamins or some concoction with a mysterious ingredient that "doctors won't talk about," as they work in cahoots with the pharmaceutical industry. One "treatment" I learned about recently promoted the miraculous attributes of coconut oil and included a YouTube link.

With this in mind, I recently saw the movie The Iron Lady, which recounts the personal history and political life of the former British prime minister Margaret Thatcher, from the vantage point of her early and later stages of dementia and its impact on her behaviour and memory. This included very poignant and vivid mixtures of past recollections and current experiences. It depicted what those working in the field see in patients, which must be explained family members. One often hears the lament, "She can remember in great detail her sea voyage as she escaped the ravages of the war in Europe but cannot remember what she had for breakfast today."

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

Sometimes the intrusion of experiences from the past can cause great agitation and behavioural outbursts, and sometimes the memories can lead to warm and tearful recollections about loved ones they think are still alive, and they are distraught when they find out their loved ones are dead.

This was illustrated in the movie when Thatcher's daughter reminds her mother of her late husband's death, as she empties his clothes closet to donate his belongings to charity. The Thatcher character associates the clothes with her husband, experiencing vivid memories of him that enter and leave her consciousness as she struggles to recall recent events.

The movie, with the role of Thatcher played stunningly by Meryl Streep, stirred a sense I have had as I observed some of the greatest or best-known great minds or public figures in the world afflicted by the usually devastating effects of dementia, most often the Alzheimer type. This has helped me explain to family members that some of the most famous and wealthiest people in the world suffered in the same way as their loved one when afflicted with this condition, despite presumably having access to the greatest medical experts in the field.

Besides Thatcher, her best political ally, U.S. president Ronald Reagan, was also afflicted with the condition. Many working in the field thought Reagan showed signs of Alzheimer's while he was still in office.

To recount the lives of the rich and famous when we speak to family members and confirm the limits of modern medicine gives us another opportunity to demonstrate that we will endeavour to do the best within the confines of contemporary medical practice.

CIJA meets with the PA in Ramallah

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has offered to be "the Canadian interlocutor" between Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) to help restart the peace process.

Although CIJA has not been officially endorsed by Ottawa to act in this capacity, senior members of CIJA met with PA President Mahmoud Abbas and other high-ranking Fatah officials during a visit to Israel and the West Bank on June 24.

They also met with high-ranking Israeli officials. Their meeting with Abbas was not widely publicized.

A spokesperson for Canada's Representative Office to the Palestinian Authority wrote in an email that it facilitates dozens of meetings every year between senior Canadian and Palestinian figures, and it did so for CIJA.

At the meeting late last month, CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel and its chair, David Koschitzky, spoke with Abbas, as well as with Palestinian legislative council member Saeb Erekat, Fatah central committee member Nabil Shaath, PA policy planning adviser Majdi al-Khalidi and PA presidential hopeful Mustafa Barghouti, among others.

Chris Greenshields, Canada's representative to the Palestinian Authority, also attended CIJA's meeting with Abbas.

Reached by phone in Ottawa on July 3, Fogel told The CJN that it was not the first time CIJA representatives had met with the PA, seeking to establish a role for Canada as a moderator in the peace process.

"The rationale for us to meet with Palestinian leadership… is to get a sense of what [the PA] is thinking at any given time – what their perspective is. At a very basic level, the purpose of these encounters was to update ourselves on the positions and concerns of the Palestinians as they relate to Israel, and the potential for a return to direct negotiations," Fogel said.

Cycling legend saved Italian Jews

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Back in the 1930s when Mussolini's Fascists ruled Italy, Gino Bartali's dad gave him some fatherly advice: steer clear of politics.

As advice goes, it was probably redundant. Bartali's passion was cycling, not politics, and he was really good at it. A national champion on several occasions, in 1938, he won his first Tour de France, the race considered by many the most gruelling endurance test for an athlete. In a cycling-mad culture like Italy's, he became a national hero, sort of the Rocket Richard of his era.

Though Bartoli did not go looking for politics, like the Rocket, politics came looking for him.

Before and during World War II, he declined to serve as a propaganda vehicle for the Fascists and got himself in their bad books. Then, during the darkest days of World War II, when Italy complied with German demands to turn over its Jews, Bartali again defied authority. He used his fame and his iconic stature to evade scrutiny by police and ferry false documents to an underground organization that was attempting to hide Jews. He also turned over his private residences, purchased with his cycling winnings, to Jews fleeing officials.

Bartali's amazing and little-known story is told in Road to Valour, a recent publication authored by the brother and sister team of Aili and Andres McConnon.

Bartali hid phony documents in the stem of his bicycle, below his seat, as part of a church-run operation, they say.

Written like a novel, the book tells the story of Italy during the war, the role of the Nazis and how Bartali responded to the barbarism around him.

In effect, he risked his life to save Jews. The McConnons estimate Bartali's efforts helped 330 Jews in Tuscany and another 300 in Umbria evade capture.

"He had a strong ethical sense that he did not agree with what was going on, particularly during the Nazi occupation," Andres said.

Order of Canada

OTTAWA — Three Jews were named members of the Order of Canada and another was promoted to companion this month. Rabbi Arthur Bielfield, rabbi emeritus at Toronto's Temple Emanu-El, was named a member for more than 30 years of contributions to Toronto's Jewish community, while Dr. Allan Gotlib of Toronto was similarly honoured for advancing research in the chiropractic profession, as was Winnipeg director Steven Schipper for his work with the Royal Manitoba Theatre Centre. Retired University of Toronto professor Natalie Zeman Davis was made a companion for her work in social history.

Not Guilty Plea

TORONTO — A Toronto woman accused of stealing from a Claims Conference fund for Holocaust survivors pleaded not guilty in New York City late last month. Luba Kramrish, 57, surrendered to the FBI and appeared in court June 28. She was charged in April for allegedly helping 20 to 25 applicants make false claims that were approved by corrupt Claims Conference employees. One is alleged to be her own mother. Kramrish, who lives in a Russian-Jewish neighbourhood, was freed on a $100,000 bond and is restricted to travelling within Ontario and parts of New York. She faces up to 20 years in jail if convicted.

Activists Want Boat

TORONTO — Canadian activists sent Israeli authorities a letter last month seeking the return of their boat that was seized when they tried to break Israel's blockade of Gaza last fall. The Canadian Boat to Gaza Steering Committee alleges the Tahrir and its cargo were illegally seized in international waters. Israel says it detained the boat in its legal 100-mile naval blockade zone. It maintains the blockade is legal, while the activists say it isn't. The activists said last week that Israel "has not yet responded to the substance of our claim," rabble.ca reported.

Neo-Nazi Allowed Online For Research

Terry Tremaine

REGINA — A Saskatchewan judge has allowed a neo-Nazi leader to go back on the Internet to do research on white supremacist websites to plan his defence against 11 charges of wilfully promoting hate against identifiable groups, including Jews and blacks.

Terry Tremaine, an ex-math lecturer at the University of Saskatchewan who heads the National-Socialist Party of Canada, is accused of posting messages such as that Jews are a "parasitic race" and "blacks are intellectually inferior to whites."

Police raided Tremaine's home in 2007 and he had been banned from going online, but changes to his bail restrictions made June 27 allow him to go online to find information that proves that his antisemitic and racist comments are true. His lawyer, Doug Christie, who also defended Holocaust deniers Jim Keegstra and Ernst Zundel, told the National Post that among his client's thousands of statements are both facts and opinions.

French Teen Attacked

PARIS — A French Jewish teenager was the victim of a violent antisemitic attack on a train travelling between Toulouse and Lyon. The victim, 17, reportedly is a student at Ozar Hatorah school in Toulouse, where an Islamist gunman shot and killed three students and a teacher in March. The teen was wearing what the French Interior Ministry called "a distinctive religious symbol," the French news service AFP reported. The teen was first verbally accosted and later beaten up by two assailants in the July 4 attack. Another passenger and train conductors reportedly came to his aid. AFP reported the assailants were identified to police by railroad authorities but that neither had been called in for questioning by the morning of July 5. The French Jewish umbrella group, CRIF, called the attack "another development in the worrying trend of antisemitism in our country."

Observing Shabbat in a cottage country shul

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Muskoka's Jewish summer community welcomes the change of season knowing they will not be compromising their Jewish traditions.

B'nai Isaac Synagogue at 1086 Burlmarie Rd. in Baysville, Muskoka, opened its doors for its 35th summer on Canada Day weekend.

Some 100 people travelled by foot, canoe, boat, car and seaplane to attend Shabbat service June 30, and several returned on July 1, Canada Day, for services and to be interviewed for this article.

To many, cottage living is a summer fling that starts on Canada Day and ends by Labour Day.

Clean air, less traffic, reconnecting with family and summer friends, fishing, swimming, boating and barbecues are some of the reasons many of us pack up and head to the cottage.

B'nai Isaac Synagogue is named after Isaac Jesin, owner of St. Andrew's Poultry Ltd., and his wife, Basia, who in 1976 purchased the four-acre property with a 1,200-foot waterfront. It was called the Burlmarie Hotel.

"We were looking for a summer place to come with our young children. Paul, Aaron, Norm, Elaine, Jerry and Eddie were growing up and we wanted a summer place to bring family and friends. My father, Yirmiyaau Slawin, thought it would be a perfect place for a synagogue," Basia Jesin said.

It took a year to renovate, and in 1977, the synagogue, which is in the main lodge of the former hotel, opened its doors. Word of mouth travelled fast among the Jewish population of Muskoka.

Amazing, typically Stratford

One of the great joys of summer in southern Ontario, in addition to the longer days, the high, powder blue skies and the happier faces of Ontarians, is the return each year of the Stratford Shakespeare Festival.

Few are the comparable experiences where one can so effusively marvel at, be absorbed into, or take such absolute delight in the sum of so many diverse, super-talented individual parts than the experience of attending a performance at the festival.

Playwrights, lyricists, musicians, choreographers, directors, set, sound and lighting engineers, wardrobe designers, wig and makeup specialists, singers, dancers and, of course, actors combine their considerable skills to produce for us a theatre fantasy world.

We enter that world for some two hours at a time. Soon after, amazement envelopes us.

So it was again, this year at the performances of The Matchmaker, 42nd Street and The Pirates of Penzance. (Due to space limitations, I will comment on only one of the plays.)

The Matchmaker, by Thornton Wilder holds the audience in thrall with scene after scene of comic grace, down-home, pithy gems of wisdom and laugh out-loud chuckling.

The story is well known to many of us as a result of its movie adaptation in 1964 as Hello, Dolly!

The plot revolves around a handful of characters who have a madcap, zany interaction one fateful day in New York City. It involves the attempt by Horace Vandergelder to impose his imperious will upon his niece, her efforts to marry whom she wishes, the bold, break-out experiences of Vandergelder's two timid store clerks, the reckless abandon of a widowed milliner and her assistant, the all-for-love crusading of a wacky spinster and the wily, wise machinations of Dolly Gallagher Levi, the matchmaker of the story.

At its core, Wilder has given us a play that pits the ideals of love and the idyllics of romance against the hardnosed cynicism of the skeptical and utilitarian.

"There is only one way to get happiness and that's to be rich enough to buy it," says the self-absorbed, curmudgeon Vandergelder. "Marriage is a bribe to make a housekeeper feel like a home owner," he sarcastically adds.

Against Vandergelder, Wilder presents the opposite view from his little-experienced but endearingly doe-eyed clerk Cornelius Hackl: "A fine woman is the greatest work of God."

"I bet you could know a woman for a hundred years and never be certain if she likes you," Cornelius tells his trusting, starry-eyed sidekick, Barnaby Tucker.

As the pace of the boisterous comedy and vaudevillian pratfalls quickens, Irene Molloy, the owner of the New York hat shop tells her assistant, "The world is full of wonderful things."

What follows is aimed at proving her hopeful proclamation.

Chris Abraham masterfully ties a ribbon of directing excellence around this very large package of high-spirited, playful, wholly entertaining humour.

The key roles are ably and at times superbly performed.

Tom McCamus is strong and effectively exaggerated as the vain, stuffy Vandergelder.

Mike Shara and Josh Epstein were like a pair of velvet gloves, fitting smoothly and seamlessly into each other's comedic timing, as the two store clerks who venture from sleepy Yonkers, "where nothing ever happens," to daunting New York City, where, in contrast, everything seems to happen.

Laura Condlin was marvellous as the lovely yet single-minded and indefatigable Irene Molloy. Her humour was smoothly and deftly delivered, whether she was berating the bumptious Cornelius, raising an eyebrow of worry or scrunching her nose in frustration.

Seanna McKenna was a perfect Dolly: authoritative, compassionate, scheming, always and ever pragmatic, but tender too. Her introspective soliloquy about "living with human beings" rather than as a "single oak leaf" tugs at the heart but never descends to maudlin or camp. The experienced McKenna imparts the important message movingly, with touching affection for her late husband and hopeful opportunity for her own future.

Although wanting a life of comfort and ease for herself, Dolly understands the deeper truth about wealth and fortune that ultimately humbles the crusty Vandergelder. And she pronounces that truth in the earthy wisdom for which The Matchmaker (and Wilder) are famous: "Money is like manure. It is not worth a thing unless it is spread around."

Federation cuts Yiddish funding

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has stopped funding its Committee for Yiddish, effective July 1.

Sol Hermolin – a member of the Committee for Yiddish and president of the Yiddish Vinkl (an independent group) – has emailed 200 people affiliated with the latter group to decry the funding cut and urge recipients to protest the decision by writing to federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky.

The federation, the committee's sole funder, provided it with $36,000 annually, allowing for a part-time staff person – Ester Klimitz, who will continue as co-ordinator until September – and underwriting programs including Yiddish classes, lectures and concerts.

The federation's campaign is down an estimated $3 million from last year, from $63 million to a projected $60.2 million.

Federation spokesperson Dan Horowitz told The CJN in an email that the organization's leaders "worked tirelessly to ensure that this year's budget provided extensive support for our community's most vulnerable, including Holocaust survivors, Israel, and Jewish education in both day schools and supplementary schools… Consequently, program spending in the fields of arts, culture, and heritage were, unfortunately, reduced."

He added that the federation would continue to fund "in the coming fiscal year, the cultural initiatives that the Committee for Yiddish (CFY) cares deeply about such as the Ashkenaz Festival and the Toronto Jewish Book Festival. In addition, UJA Federation will be offering the committee members other forms of assistance so that Yiddish language classes can be offered at our three JCCs across the city, in which space will be made available for CFY meetings as well."

Hermolin, a Toronto native whose parents spoke Yiddish, said in an interview the cut is "a crushing blow to Yiddish culture."

In an email to federation chair Elizabeth Wolfe, he wrote that Yiddish "has developed a culture abundant with music, literature, poetry and humour."

Hermolin said he was thankful for the federation's support of the committee but asked Wolfe to reinstate funding so that the committee can continue to provide the community with classes and cultural events.

Neighbours fed up with home-based shul

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

For Sylvia Wolfson, seeing a contractor's truck parked illegally in front of Ateres Mordechai last month was the "final straw."

The synagogue, located at 230 Arnold Ave., has been her next-door neighbour since 2009 and is probably Thornhill's largest home-based synagogue.

"I have appealed to [shul founder] Rabbi [Avrohom] Bitterman on many occasions about the parking and the commotion in the neighbourhood as a result of the people that are coming there," Wolfson said.

She has come to the conclusion that Rabbi Bitterman is "not a man who's planning on moving," although he told The CJN last week he is "actively pursuing" the search for a home for the shul in a non-residential zone.

Esther Zeisler, who lives around the corner from Wolfson, said that "most of the immediate neighbours are against having this situation continue."

The City of Vaughan allows home-based synagogues, but according to Ward 5 Coun. Alan Shefman, they are "not acceptable" in residential areas and "can't possibly meet the requirements in our bylaw."

Shefman has been fielding complaints about home synagogues for several years. He said that issues include parking, setbacks from neighbouring homes, and fire safety.

As well, he said, "people buy their homes to live in a residential area, and if there isn't an institution that's been there prior to them buying their home, it's fundamentally unfair for them to have an institution plunked down in the middle of the street."

One of the problems, he said, is that there are few green spaces or storefronts available in his ward, which is bounded by Steeles Avenue, Yonge Street, Highway 407 and New Westminster Drive. The ward's population is approximately 60 per cent Jewish.

"I know for a fact they have done everything they can to try to minimize their impact on the community," Shefman said of Ateres Mordechai.

But he said he sees "co-operation [as] an interim measure… until they find a proper home."

Rabbi Bitterman says that about 25 to 30 people attend Shabbat services, and about 15 go to daily minyans, but Wolfson believes the number is higher. The shul also has classes.

The rabbi also said that most of the recent work in the house was just maintenance. However, he added, "one wall was opened up to accommodate when we have a simchah." He said that such occasions occur "a few times a year," and that speakers are invited to the shul "a couple of times a year."

He said that illegal parking occurs "rarely if ever," but Wolfson said that last fall, several cars were illegally parked for 72 hours on three separate weekends and were not ticketed. Parking is allowed on the south side of the street only.

In a recent email to Shefman, she wrote that parking violations make it unsafe to back out of her driveway and even more unsafe for cars to turn at the corner of the street.

She noted that Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue of Toronto is only a five-minute drive from Arnold Avenue and offers the same services to the Orthodox community in the area.

In a letter last fall to Vaughan mayor Maurizio Bevilacqua, Wolfson wrote of "flagrant violations of city bylaws" by Ateres Mordechai, including the use of fireworks at an evening party and possible lack of permit for modifications to the house.

Rabbi Bitterman said that the building meets fire regulations and that he has increased exterior lighting to allay neighbours' concerns.

He said he "would love to have a real place, with a parking lot, where people would feel comfortable… We really don't want any problems with our neighbours."

Community rallies to support Jewish LGBT group at Pride

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Members of Toronto's gay and lesbian community enjoyed a rambunctious 2012 Pride Parade, despite the participation of a virulently anti-Israel organization in the march.

Kulanu Toronto, the city's main Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered organization, drew a large number of guests to march with its members at the July 1 event.

Justine Apple, Kulanu's executive director, said she was very happy with the turnout and support her organization received from both the Jewish community and other pro-Israel allies.

"It was amazing. We had more than 100 people march with us," she said.

Supporters and marchers in Kulanu's delegation included representatives of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, the City Shul, McMaster Israel on Campus, Congregation Shir Libeynu, Temple Har Zion, First Narayever Congregation, Temple Sinai, Congregation Darchei Noam, JSpaceCanada, ARZA (Canadian Reform Zionists), and St. Paul Liberal MPP Eric Hoskins.

"We were proud to represent the Jewish community at the Pride Parade, where we marched to celebrate our double roles as proud members of the gay and lesbian community and proud supporters of the State of Israel," Apple said. "We marched in an atmosphere of harmony and respect."

On June 29, Pride Toronto's new dispute resolution panel ruled that controversial group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) could participate in the parade this year. The panel heard arguments from B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights that sought to have the anti-Israel group barred from the Pride festivities.

The panel ruled that the term "Israeli apartheid" is not hate speech, since the City of Toronto's own anti-discrimination policy doesn't classify it that way, and neither human rights tribunals nor courts of law have ever ruled on the phrase.

In September, the city's executive council is slated to review Toronto's non-discrimination policy and also the term itself to decide whether the Pride Parade, which receives nearly $104,000 in city grants annually, should continue to receive public funding in 2013.

More shocking yet

Even though we used this space last week to point out the double-speaking duplicity of the United Nations for allowing Iran to ridicule Jews and Judaism and to continue to call for the annihilation of the Jewish state, we are compelled to once again write about that organization. Some of the developments and pronouncements emanating from the UN and its agencies are so egregious, so preposterous, so shocking that they must not be ignored.

UN Watch, the Geneva-based NGO, reported this week that Syria has announced it will seek a seat on the UN's 47-member Human Rights Council. The election for the vacant seat will be conducted next year. But the word "election" in relation to membership on the council is as appropriate as it is in relation to elections in Iran. That is, not at all.

As Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch, points out, once Syria becomes the nominee of the UN's 53-nation Asian group, "Syria's candidacy would be virtually assured," for the group will only nominate as many candidates as it has vacancies to fill.

Setting aside for the moment even superficial scrutiny into the record of the UN Human Rights Council, the mere idea of Syria being considered as a member of a body whose mission is to protect and defend human rights can cause one to experience vertigo and nausea. It is simply absurd, an affront to conscience and a complete overturning of the plain meaning of words and language.

President Bashar Assad's forces and various henchmen are believed to have murdered as many as 14,000 fellow countrymen since February. Countless thousands more have been tortured and brutalized.

Yet, the possibility of Syrian membership on the council seems not to bother too many other countries. The United States and Europe attempted last week to pre-empt the possibility of Syria's ascension to the council, but their attempt was stymied by such international human rights stalwarts as China, Cuba and Egypt. As UN Watch further reported, Russia and India argued that it was premature to decide the matter before Syria had formally submitted its candidacy, adding that Syria after all, might be a good candidate for the council, since it had been unanimously elected last year to two human rights committees of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

We are no longer surprised by the dark, low crevices of immorality and hypocrisy that the UN and its agencies occupy. Once demonization and delegitimization of Israel became the international body's recurring obsession, the perversion of the UN was inevitable.

We abhor what the UN and its agencies have become. We lament what they could have been.

Response to Jason Kenney

Thank you for your coverage of the Harper government's treatment of refugees, including the passage of Bill C-31, Protecting Canada's Immigration System Act, and the recent modifications to refugees' health-care benefits ("Rabbis urge PM not to cut refugees' health care," CJN, July 5).

Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney makes it plain that the changes are meant to deter Roma refugees from Hungary from applying.

He is quoted as saying that when refugees arrive in Canada from certain "countries not known to produce refugees," there can be a "presumption that few of those claims are likely to be valid." A fair refugee system evaluates each claimant's case according to its own merits, rather than making "presumptions." My father was interned as a "friendly enemy alien" in England in 1940, and then in Canada, because German Jewish refugees were presumed, based on their nationality, to represent a security threat.

You write that Kenney "questioned... why Hungarian citizens seeking refuge [do not] take advantage of their full mobility rights within the European Union." Let me answer. In Greece, the skinheads of the neo-Nazi "Golden Dawn" march under swastika banners. In France, Marine LePen's National Front experienced a surge in support in recent elections. In Italy, municipal authorities evict Roma families from refugee camps, according to Amnesty International.

Mr. Kenney, why are you surprised that Hungarian Roma – terrified by the growing influence of the neo-fascist Jobbik party (now the third-largest group in the Hungarian Parliament) – seek refuge in Canada, rather than in the European Union?

Rabbi Michal Shekel says the new immigration legislation should be rewritten "in a more nuanced manner." Sadly, it appears that Mr. Kenney doesn't do nuance very well.

In support of all Jews

Last week, I marched in Toronto's Gay Pride Parade with Kulanu, the city's Jewish LGBT social, educational and cultural organization, to support all Jews, no matter who they are. The carnival spirit was infectious. One of our marchers sprayed water at onlookers and we were often doused. We held our banners high – the blue Magen David, the rainbow flags and the placards showing Israel as one of the most tolerant and diverse countries on this planet. I carried a cheeky placard that was a real hit.

But most satisfying was the response from the thousands of people along the parade route. Except for a very few boos, the response was heartfelt and positive. We were met with cheers, applause and thumbs up.

As well as having the most fun I've had in a long time, I felt proud to support my community and Israel. I hope that next year we can triple our numbers. It's the best way to fight back.

Haredim and the Internet

The article "Haredi community unites against Internet use" (JTA, May 31) gives the impression that haredim are opposed to the Internet mainly because of pornography. As haredim proscribe talking about sex, non-Orthodox Jews don't understand the extent of their abhorrence of the Internet. Chapters 23 and 25 of the Enen HaEzer section of the Shulchan Aruch (Code of Jewish Laws), written about 450 years ago and based on the Talmud, is their guide as to how stringent one must be on sexual matters, even in marital relations.

It is certainly not the liberal Jewish view of conjugal sex in books by Rabbi Shmuley Boteach and Dr. Ruth Westheimer. It is a prohibition against both any form of sexual arousal outside of marriage and reading "heretical" literature. Therefore, haredim dread the Internet because of pop-up ads showing attractive women and because one may encounter non-Orthodox Torah. Indeed, some haredi rabbis warn that one can lose one's share of the world to come because of improper sexual thoughts.

Shamir was steadfast in his devotion to Greater Israel

Chemi Shalev
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Of all the Israelis who have led Israel since its inception in 1948, Yitzhak Shamir is the only one who was a true zealot. A modest and moderate man with infinite self-control, he was nonetheless a fanatic devotee of his vision of the Jewish people and the Greater Land of Israel. The end, in his eyes, always justified the means.

I covered Shamir during his years as prime minister during the late 1980s and early 1990s, accumulated many "Shamir hours" in his bureau and – much to the chagrin of many of my colleagues and most of my friends – both liked and admired him. He had what Americans would call "true grit" in his ideological convictions, was undeterred by hardships and unmoved by temptations. He kept his eye on the only ball that mattered to him – the preservation of the Greater Land of Israel – and viewed everything else as subservient diversions. He was one of the last of the "generation of giants" who had fought, often against all odds, for the establishment of the Jewish homeland.

Despite his public image as a dull politician and uninspiring leader, Shamir was a well-read man and an engaging conversationalist who, unlike many of his successors, was possessed with enough self-confidence and intellectual curiosity to relish debate and criticism. He had a grudging respect for wily ideologues made in his own image, even if they came from the opposite end of the ideological spectrum. The first newspapers he read in the morning were the now-defunct left-wing party organs, Davar and al-Hamishmar. The perennial Soviet foreign minister Andrei Gromyko was one of his adversarial favourites.

He had a functional approach to haredi parties and viewed their demands for greater control of religious life as a reasonable price to pay for their support for his right-wing policies. But he miscalculated the vehemence and outrage of American Jewry when he agreed in 1988 to give haredim exclusive control over conversions, and capitulated to Diaspora demands in order to appease American Jews, whom he viewed as even more vital to his overall designs.

He disliked "professional politicians" and was no great fan of Shimon Peres, with whom he had forged a six-year national unity partnership at the helm, nor Benjamin Netanyahu, the Likud superstar who would eventually take Shamir's place after Shamir's electoral loss in 1992 to Yitzhak Rabin. Netanyahu's slick, American-style politicking was alien to Shamir, and his willingness to grudgingly adopt the Oslo accords in order to win over centrist voters in the 1996 elections was viewed by Shamir both as betrayal and as a vindication of his earlier mistrust. But he got along well with Rabin, a fellow straight shooter, who served as Shamir's tough-minded defence minister until 1990.

Shamir's most grievous sin, in the eyes of many – including this writer – was his decision to undermine the 1987 London framework agreement on the Palestinian problem reached between his then-foreign minister Peres and Jordan's King Hussein. Shamir's refusal to entertain any sort of territorial compromise caused him to terminate the agreement. In so doing, he also terminated the so-called "Jordanian Option" on the West Bank as well. This ultimately helped usher in the first intifadah and enabled the ascendancy of the PLO and Hamas. It is from this fork in the historic road that Israel has continued on its path of endless confrontation and futile occupation, although for Shamir, of course, these were just momentary hardships in the eternal battle for Jewish survival.

Yitzhak Shamir

He viewed the West Bank as the hinterland to which millions of Jews from around the world would come to settle. In 1989, he vehemently challenged Peres' assertion that Mikhail Gorbachev's perestroika would keep Soviet Jews in Russia. "Millions will come," Shamir declared, to Peres' scorn. It was his utter devotion to these millions and his single-minded adherence to his plan to bring them to Judea and Samaria – a scheme that the immigrants themselves did not follow – that propelled Shamir into the head-on confrontation with then-U.S. president George Bush over loan guarantees that may have cost him his job.

His decision to refrain from retaliating against Iraqi missile attacks in the first Gulf War as well as his acquiescence, after months and months of wrangling that infuriated Washington, should also be viewed, first and foremost, as tactical manoeuvres aimed at warding off pressure and preserving Israel's hold on the occupied territories. He fended off criticism from both the left and the right by waving his hand and exclaiming "nu, tov" before going back to his main objective.

His black-or-white, good-versus-evil, Jew-versus-non-Jew outlook was forged in his youth in antisemitic Poland, sculpted by his membership in the hardline Revisionist youth movement Betar and seared into his consciousness by his story of the death of his father, who was stoned to death by non-Jewish Poles while trying to escape the Nazis, just outside his then-Polish birthplace of Ruzhany, in modern Belarus.

He was a man of iron will, absolute determination and supreme ruthlessness. He salvaged the crumbling pre-state Lehi underground movement after the death of its founder, Avraham Stern, planned and expanded its policy of terror and assassination, ran from British authorities, lived in disguise and once hid for many months, completely alone and totally vigilant, in the orange groves north of Tel Aviv, near the Mediterranean Coast. It is in these years that he learned to keep his thoughts and feelings to himself, and to remain eternally suspicious of both enemies and friends.

Though many might view his ascendancy to the premiership as an accident of history, I tend to believe that it was the inevitable result of the sheer unstoppable brute force of his iron will. He never abandoned the vows that he took in the pre-state underground, and he forever abided by the line penned by Stern in the Lehi anthem: "We serve our cause for the length of our lives, a service which ends with our breath."

On June 30 in Tel Aviv, Shamir was finally discharged from his service.

'I didn't see myself as Begin's heir'

Jonathan Lis
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Yitzhak Shamir, Israel's seventh prime minister, and the country's second-longest-serving prime minster after David Ben-Gurion, died June 30 in a seniors' residence in Tel Aviv. He was 96 years old.

Shamir served as premier from October 1983 to September 1984, succeeding Menachem Begin, and later as head of the second national unity government, from 1986 to 1990. He then led a right-wing coalition until 1992, when Yitzhak Rabin defeated him at the polls.

In his autobiography, Shamir wrote, "I didn't see myself as Begin's heir, but rather someone who would continue his work," Shamir said after he became prime minister.

Shamir was born in Ruzhany, now in Belarus, in 1915 as Yitzhak Yezernitsky. The small town became part of Poland after World War I. He studied in a school belonging to the Jewish Tarbut network, joined the Zionist Betar movement and studied law at the University of Warsaw.

When he was 20, he immigrated to Palestine and joined the Irgun two years later. By day he worked in an accountant's office and at night took part in anti-British activities.

In 1940, Shamir left the Irgun, following Avraham Stern, and became a leader of the Lehi, the acronym for Lochamei Herut Yisrael, which the British called the Stern Gang.

In December 1941 he was arrested and spent time in the Mizra prison near Acre. After escaping in September 1942, he was put in charge of operations. In this role, he was responsible for the 1944 assassination of Lord Moyne, the British minister of state in the Middle East.

As Shamir put it, Moyne "was a senior official in enforcing British policy in Palestine and didn't for a moment hide his strong opposition to Zionism and his negative feelings toward the Jews."

In 1946, Shamir was deported to Eritrea. He escaped a year later. In 1955, he joined the Mossad, where he worked for 10 years.

After joining the Herut Party in 1970, Shamir was elected to the Knesset in 1973 and served six terms.

In the 1992 elections, Shamir was severely beaten by Rabin and resigned as Likud leader. He served in the Knesset until 1996, when he retired from all political activity, although he continued to criticize the Oslo accords and Benjamin Netanyahu's policies as prime minister.

In 2001, Shamir was awarded the Israel Prize for his service to the nation.

Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird called Shamir a historic leader with "unwavering dedication" to Israel.

"Canadians admired his selfless sacrifice to his country – the country he risked his life protecting and dedicated his career to serving," Baird said. "We will remember him as a true leader, and a dear friend of Canada."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, recalled Shamir as a man of "strength and courage" who was dedicated to the betterment of Israel.

"He will be remembered as one of the great leaders of this nation, a man who fought for what was best for his people and was committed to protecting their safety and security. He was a man of supreme loyalty and integrity and has left a permanent and distinguished mark on the State of Israel," Fogel said.

Israeli President Shimon Peres called Shamir, with whom he sometimes clashed ideologically, a "brave warrior" for Israel.

"He fought with courage against the British Mandate in the days of the underground, and his incredible contribution to the State of Israel during his time in the Mossad will remain forever enshrined in the tales of bravery of our nation. He was loyal to his views, a great patriot and a true lover of Israel who served his country with integrity and unending commitment."

Finding ritual beauty as we pack to leave

A student of the history of Vancouver's Jewish community will note that many of its institutions are built along the Oak Street corridor. Driving from Los Angeles to Vancouver on I-5 will bring you past Temple Sholom, the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, the Louis Brier Home for the Aged, the Beth Israel Synagogue, Vancouver Talmud Torah and the Schara Tzedeck synagogue, all without having to wander far from the straight and narrow.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Most of these institutions were built in their present locations after World War II, when the Jewish community doubled in size. Our synagogue, Beth Israel, was dedicated in 1948, although the congregation itself dated from 1932.

Our shul is now an aging structure that has outlived its usefulness in its present form. Therefore, we have embarked on creating a new synagogue with expanded facilities and a very different look from the boxy building we now call home.

That's a long-winded introduction to my topic, the concept of hiddur mitzvah, making the mitzvah a thing of beauty.

As volunteer custodian of the Beth Israel Judaica museum, initiated by and dedicated to our former rabbi and his wife – Rabbi Wilfred and Phyllis Solomon – I have the task of packing up the some 120 artifacts in that collection and storing them until the new building is ready.

Our museum was created to display the works of many different Jewish communities around the globe – a Mosaic mosaic, if you will. We have items from India, North Africa, western, central and eastern Europe, and communities throughout the Middle East, including Syria, Iran, Mandate Palestine and modern Israel. Each one has a story.

It may be a family heirloom brought from another homeland now desolate of its Jews. It may be an unusual article used by a person whose name remains, even though the story is lost. This is true of a bronze scribal kit that has the name of the scribe engraved on it.

We have a set of circumcision implements, in themselves ordinary, but they came with the journal of the mohel who recorded every circumcision he performed in late-19th-century Europe.

One of my favourites is an enigmatic spice box, shaped like a stork. She – I'm sure it's a she – stands elegantly and gracefully on one leg, holding a snake in her mouth. Why a stork? Why a snake?

We also have a tzedakah box from Hungary. To look at this lovely box is to recall the vibrant Hungarian community from which it came, and to realize that the community no longer exists.

That same historical awareness is evoked by a chanukiyah from Damascus. The community is no more, yet here is a beautiful remnant of its past.

On the other hand, a delicate egg-shaped carved wooden spice box from the Bezalel school in Jerusalem testifies to the rebirth of the skills associated with Bezalel, builder of the tabernacle. It reminds us that in Israel, there has been a rebirth of the visual and plastic arts.

While the biblical view of making images is very strict – no graven images of anything on, above or below the earth – one needs only to visit the archeological sites of classical synagogues in Israel to see that the people weren't shy about decorating their synagogue floors with stunning mosaic images of biblical stories, as well as the zodiac and, gasp, even paganish images of the sun.

Not to mention the frescos of the Syrian synagogue at Dura Europos, a visual feast for the eyes.

The other reminder of a long period of portrayal of the human form is the myriad of Haggadot that have survived from Sephardi lands. I'm thinking of the illustrations in the Sarajevo Haggadah in particular. The Rylands and the Ashkenazi Haggadah blaze with colour and animation as well (although it's theorized that the illustrations may have been done by Christian artisans).

So throughout the 2,000 of Diaspora, Jewish communities and families strove to make the things that embodied ritual and ceremony as beautiful as possible. Had those same communities been free to participate in the flourishing Renaissance of painting as well, who knows what masterpieces would have emerged?

So as I pack away our little museum, I linger to appreciate the beauty each item brings to the mitzvah for which it was created.

Growing up means learning about consequences

To be a human being is to steadily become aware of the consequences of one's actions.

Babies slowly learn that crying will bring help. They begin with an instinctual ability to suck so that they can get milk, but after that, all is learned. And the learning is that every action can bring consequences. Thus, children learn of parental approval and disapproval. If they behave, mom and dad will be proud or buy them a present. If they misbehave, there will be "consequences." Maybe all they'll suffer is an angry word or look. Maybe they'll miss dessert or a special TV program. But the process of maturation involves learning the consequences of our acts. This seems to me to be an essential element to all human growth – biological and spiritual.

In fact, I would think that one of the most important parts of parenting is this process of teaching children the lesson of consequences. It's neither an easy process nor a simple one-time pedagogic event. It requires constant patterning and processing. At every stage of a person's life, one must learn and relearn this lesson of cost and reward. It's never a simple thing, and one can easily overlook the power of this part of education. And yet it's so important and demanding. For many the absence of this crucial element can mean the growth of a sense of entitlement. One can think I want something now and that simply the wanting of it is enough.

Let me explain.

Students today are filled with a sense of entitlement. I see it in the classroom quite often. I see it on TV, too. But this past semester, I saw it in a special way.

Quebec students are asking for, nay demanding a tuition freeze. Why? Because they believe they're entitled to a free education. There's no sense in their rhetoric of the consequences to society of that tuition freeze. No sense of who will have to pay the bill or what the costs of their disruption will be. Further, they ignore the consequences of their dissidence on other students – on those who spent their hard-earned money on a wasted semester; on those who needed to graduate, and on those whose jobs were waiting and are now lost. Only their interests and goals were considered. The experience of entitlement wiped out the worry of consequences. And when universities and CEGEPS raised issues of consequences – of costs and incomplete grades – student leaders demanded that those be removed from the table. No fees for late completion, please. No consequences to us for our disruptions, please.

If people don't think their own work has consequences, they don't necessarily expect that they must work for rewards. If they don't need to work, but want the goods of society, all they need to do is demand those goods. Similarly, if they do something that's illegitimate, but don't necessarily think they should pay for those acts, they'll demand no consequences.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Simply because they ask for something, because they demand it and demand it with large numbers of dissidents, they believe they should be rewarded. No consequences.

These aren't lessons we should support.

The Bible is at great pains to clarify the process of reward and punishment to an emergent community. In the beginning, the people Israel need God to do everything for them. Like a child, they can't determine their own path or procedures. But as the community matures, God intends them to begin the process of making decisions between right and wrong, of learning that lesson of consequences." If you do this, then..." As the stories move along, more is expected of us – more decisions, more responsibility. We're supposed to know that there are consequences to our actions and, therefore, to choose wisely. We're not entitled. We must work for the things we need and want. That's the message of our Torah.

That's the lesson of parenting

That's the process of teaching.

There are consequences to all our actions. We must be aware of them. If we think we're right, then go out and make your point, but don't expect that there will be no consequences.

Life is more complicated than that.

A cornucopia of books ...

With summer here in all its warm and sunny glory, book lovers can sit back and immerse themselves in some of the latest books, all hot off the press.

The first volume of the Encyclopedia of Camps and Ghettos appeared three years ago and was a landmark in the historiography of the Holocaust. Here was a book that plumbed the awful depths of an unfathomable event, a book that survivors and scholars alike could dip into.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Volume II, now available, is published in two parts by Indiana University Press. The editors are Geoffrey P. Megargee and Martin Dean, and each volume is introduced by the American historian Christopher Browning.

Its scope is massive.

Part A focuses on Poland, the Baltic states, Ukraine and Russia, while Part B concentrates on the Czech lands, areas of Poland, Russia and the Baltic countries not covered in the previous volume, as well as Greece.

Illustrated with black and white photographs, volumes A and B delve deeply into each region and town, leaving no stone unturned.

The entry for Grybow is typical in terms of its exhaustive approach. Grybow, with 847 Jews out of a total population of 2,931, was 94 kilometres southeast of Krakow. Occupied by the German army within a week of the outbreak of World War II, the town was subjected to the usual antisemitic indignities, and very few Jews managed to survive the Nazi occupation.

As Browning suggests, the Jews who fell into the clutches of the Nazis never stood a chance: "Ultimately, Jewish leaders had no option or choice at their disposal that could save their communities. Whether the Germans ghettoized their victim for varying periods of time or killed them immediately, the catastrophic and tragic end result was determined by German intent and power, not by Jewish decisions."

Italy, though allied with Germany in World War II, defied German wishes in its treatment of Jews in occupied Croatia. Individual Italian soldiers took it upon themselves to help Jews and Serbs, whose communities were being systematically destroyed by Croatian fascists. But from 1941 to 1943, these isolated acts developed into what author Benjamin Wood describes as "a conspiracy at the highest levels of the Italian government and military to save Jews from deportation and death."

In Defying Evil: How the Italian Army Saved Croatian Jews During the Holocaust (History Publishing Company), Wood claims that about 3,500 Jewish men and children owe their lives to Italian intervention.

"Although the motivations for some Italians were somewhat questionable, the overriding tenet was a sense of humanitarianism," he writes in this valuable book. "Many Italian officers, when told by their German counterparts that they would have to hand over Jews, simply refused, declaring that such an action was beneath the dignity of the Italian army and a violation of Italian honour."

The Tour de France, now under way, is a feat of immense skill, endurance and courage, recent doping scandals notwithstanding. One of its two-time winners, Gino Bartali of Italy, pulled himself up from poverty in rural Tuscany. In addition to being a legendary figure in cycling, he was a man of rare compassion. In Nazi-occupied Italy, he parlayed his fame by sheltering a Jewish family in an apartment he had bought with his winnings.

Bartali's heroics are recounted by Alli and Andres McConnon in Road To Valour: A True Story Of World War II Italy, The Nazis, And The Cyclist Who Inspired A Nation (Doubleday Canada). Their book is promoted as the first ever written about Bartali in English and the only one in any language to fully explore his wartime exploits.

Steven K. Baum, a psychologist, editor of the Journal for the Study of Antisemitism and author of Antisemitism Explained (University Press of America), approaches his topic from a clinician's point of view.

As he puts it, "The tenet of the book is simple, albeit somewhat disturbing: antisemitism will always exist because people are prone to believe social fantasies about the Jews more than realities." Starting from that assumption, Baum launches into an intriguing analysis of the roots and manifestations of this ancient hatred.

Tapping into a strain of nativism and xenophobia, the American automobile tycoon Henry Ford published a newspaper that demonized Jews and sowed the seeds of antisemitism in the United States. With a circulation of nearly 700,000 at its peak in the 1920s, the Dearborn Independent was sent unsolicited to schools, libraries, universities and Ford dealerships.

In one of its editions, the Dearborn Independent ran a series of articles that accused Aaron Sapiro, a California lawyer involved in the burgeoning agricultural co-operation movement, of leading a Jewish conspiracy to subvert American agriculture.

Sapiro sued Ford and his newspaper for libel, triggering a legal process that culminated in a mistrial after a number of bizarre events. To ensure that the case did not surface again, Ford hired a top-of-the-line Jewish lawyer, Louis Marshall, to write an apology for his antisemitic misdeeds.

Victoria Saker Woeste expertly explores this incident in Henry Ford's War on Jews And The Legal Battle Against Hate Speech (Stanford University Press). Her verdict is decisive: "For everyone in the Sapiro case, except perhaps Ford, victory was elusive. Louis Marshall was not so naïve as to believe that Ford had truly repented. By substituting his own authority for law, however, he permitted Ford to evade a more lasting judgment."

Paul Reitter, in On The Origins of Jewish Self-Hatred (Princeton University Press), analyses this phenomenon in dual fashion. First, he examines the views of Anton Kuh, the Viennese-Jewish journalist who coined the term, and of Theodor Lessig, the German-Jewish philosopher who popularized the concept in a book. Second, he explores the relationship between Jewish self-hatred and Jewish anti-Zionism. Reitter's book is rigorously academic in tone and thus of interest to a limited readership.

The same holds true for Forced Baptisms: Histories of Jews, Christians and Converts In Papal Rome (University of California Press) by Marina Caffiero.

Ben G. Frank's travelogue, The Scattered Tribe (Globe Pequot Press), a popular account of far-flung Diaspora communities from Siberia to Morocco, has far more appeal.

Read Frank in conjunction with Levana Kirschenbaum's The Whole Foods Kosher Kitchen (Levana Cooks), a big, glossy, lavishly illustrated cookbook that examines a wide variety of national cuisines from Moroccan to Italian and posts easy-to-implement recipes.

A Palestinian state is emerging, settler laments

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A Palestinian state is quietly and steadily emerging with the knowledge and cooperation of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, charges a member of an organization categorically opposed to territorial compromise.

"Unfortunately, Netanyahu has done a great deal to lay the ground work for a Palestinian state," claimed Yisrael (Izzy) Danziger, the director of operations of Mishmeret Yesha, a grassroots activist group based in Jerusalem that believes not a single "grain of sand" in the territories should be relinquished to the Palestinians.

Danziger, a 59-year-old resident of a settlement in the West Bank, said that Netanyahu has adopted this position against his will due to international pressure.

The Israeli government is allowing the Palestinian Authority to establish the infrastructure of a state under its very nose by permitting the PA to build a police force, schools, industrial zones, roads, water pumping stations, quarries and the like.

Yisrael (Izzy) Danziger

A two-state solution would not only jeopardize Israel's existence but lead to its destruction, he warned in an interview during a recent visit to Toronto.

By ceding strategic high ground and vital water sources to the PA in any future agreement, Israel would be undermining its own security.

Judea and Samaria, as he prefers to call the West Bank, belong legally to Israel, he said, adding that Palestinian refugees can be resettled in any of the more than 20 Arab countries.

Jews living in the West Bank face a war of terror, with tens of thousands of terrorist incidents having occurred since the 1993 Oslo accords, Danziger declared. "Since Oslo, the security situation has deteriorated."

For the past few years, Mishmeret Yesha, a division of the Movement for Jewish Sovereignty in Israel, has been training and equipping Jewish rapid response teams in the West Bank with armoured combat vests. These vests, each worth $1,250, offer a high degree of protection from bomb blasts and shrapnel.

"Many people have been saved by these vests," he noted.

Danziger, a former New Yorker and an Orthodox Jew, claimed that the dire security situation in the West Bank is a microcosm of the problems Israel currently faces on all fronts.

Israel's already cold peace with Egypt will become colder now that Egyptians have voted to elect a new president, Mohammed Morsi, a member of the anti-Israel Muslim Brotherhood movement.

Morsi will not openly cancel the 1979 peace treaty with Israel, but will allow the complete radicalization of the Sinai, Danziger said.

With terrorists establishing themselves in Egypt's Sinai Peninsula, Israel may be forced to mount retaliatory raids into the Sinai, prompting Egyptian military responses, he predicted.

He said, "Egypt will be fighting us from the border of the Negev."

Danziger fears that Islamic forces will overthrow the monarchy in Jordan and supplant Syria's secular Baathist regime, turning Syria into "another Lebanon."

In the event of an Islamic takeover in Amman, Israel may have to invade Jordan for its own self-protection, he said.

According to Danziger, Israel is neither militarily ready to attack Iran's nuclear facilities nor prepared to defend itself against an Iranian counter-strike.

In his view, Israeli Arabs, comprising 20 per cent of Israel's population, cannot ever be loyal citizens and are a "cancer" in Israel's body politic. "They are a cancer because of who they are and what they believe," he observed, saying they owe their religious and national allegiance to the greater Arab world.

"Basically, they are intrinsically disloyal to Israel. They have to be transferred to an Arab country. It will have to happen in the course of a very major war."

Surveying these scenarios, he concluded, "Israel's basic security is threatened."

Israelis are generally too complacent about these looming threats to Israel's national existence, Danziger said.

"The Israeli psyche, the Israeli mindset, has to change," he said, pointing out that a large proportion of able-bodied Jewish men and women do not even serve in the armed forces.

IGTO director prepares to leave Toronto

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It's getting close to the time when Oded Grofman will park the RV for good, put away his skates and other hockey paraphernalia and pack for the trip back to Israel.

As director of the Toronto-based Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO), Grofman has promoted travel to Israel over the past five years. If the numbers are any indication, he's been pretty good at it. Since his arrival, the flow of tourists heading to Israel for vacations and other stays has grown from 50,000 to 75,000 – a jump of 50 per cent.

And while the Israeli-born Grofman has done his best to get Canadians to visit the Holy Land, he's reciprocated by adapting as best he could to Canadian culture. Among the Canadian things he and his family have enjoyed are the camping trips in national and provincial parks – hence the RV – and the hockey lessons he and other Israelis enjoyed every week at a north Toronto hockey school.

Oded Grofman

He's likely also seen more of the country than a typical poutine-eating, maple syrup-loving native Johnny Canuck.

He's enjoyed his sojourn here in the Great White North, but sometime in August he, his wife and two sons will be back in Israel. He is being replaced by Ami Alon, as of September.

Although Grofman won't be working for the Israeli Ministry of Tourism, he'll remain in the industry as deputy director general of the Israel Incoming Tour Operator Association. That organization's goal is to protect the interests of Israel's incoming tour operators while promoting and developing the country's tourism industry.

Tourism and travel gets into your blood, he explained during a recent retrospective interview at the IGTO's downtown office.

Grofman, who left the private sector to take a job promoting travel to Israel, executed the Tourism Ministry's game plan to a tee, with the resulting resurgence in visits to the Holy Land.

That strategic approach meant targeting three distinctive market segments – Jewish travellers, Christian pilgrims, and "sophisticated" travellers who favour exotic locales that offer fine dining, adventurous experiences, good beaches, clubs, music events and the like.

When he first came to Toronto, he didn't know much about the Canadian market, he acknowledged. "I read about it and talked to people who served here. I didn't know the players, the Jewish community, or the Christian community. I was very green."

His first task on arrival was to "stabilize" the Toronto office, which had been run out of New York for one year after his predecessor left the job.

Then there were all the introductions to be made, meeting tour operators, airline officials, travel agents in Toronto and across the country.

He found that many significant tour operators did not offer Israel as a destination. It wasn't even on their radar, he said.

His approach: find the tour operators and bring them to Israel to see first hand they could offer the country as a destination free of concerns over security. He encouraged the creation of packages that sold the country for its religious, spiritual, historical and cultural aspects, as well as for its appeal to "sophisticated" travellers.

He and his staff promoted the country across media platforms, with many magazine and newspaper stories being the result.

He also reached out to a number of cultural communities, including Chinese Canadians and of course, religious communities.

At a farewell breakfast in his honour last week, representatives of some of those communities gushed over Grofman's people skills.

Father Thomas Rosica, chief executive officer of Salt and Light, a Catholic media organization, recalled meeting Grofman in Israel in August 2007 in Bethany. "He instantly won people's hearts," he said.

He's been working with Grofman ever since, and he credits him with facilitating the production of two documentary films created by Salt and Light.

The films, Journey of Light and Within Your Gates, focus on pilgrimages to the Holy Land. The documentaries have been widely seen by Canadian and American Catholics as well as leaders in the Vatican, including the current Pope, he said.

"The Vatican is thrilled we have such a relationship," Father Rosica said.

Grofman "is a great ambassador for Israel, the Jewish people and the Holy Land," Father Rosica added.

Addressing the farewell breakfast, Grofman said he enjoyed working in an industry that "fulfilled people's dreams and made them happy."

As he prepares to leave, after spending the long weekend at the lake, he recounted asking his seven-year-old son, Yuval, how he felt going back to Israel.

Happy and sad, his son replied "and that's exactly how I feel," Grofman agreed.

Muskoka shul allows Jews to maintain religion

Everyone is welcome – cottage renters, cottage owners and visitors to the area.

The Jesin family live in other buildings on the property during the summer.

"My grandparents, Isaac and Basia, turned this into a family compound. My earliest memories are of coming to the cottage every weekend and running around with my cousins. We would have colour wars and carnivals.

"We are grown up now and scattered – some live in Israel, some in New York. However, there is at least one weekend where everyone comes up and reconnects," granddaughter Rachel Shiff said.

"When we were looking for a cottage and found out the synagogue was in the area, it was the deciding factor for us," cottage owner Rena Levy said.

"Some of our children stay up all summer, some for an extended long weekend," Levy, the mother of eight children, said. "It's a wonderful meeting place, as they live in different countries. I do the kosher shopping in the city and bring it up to the cottage, with the joy of sharing Shabbat dinner on the porch with the family."

Isaac and Basia's son, Aaron Jesin, a family physician and mohel, said, "We honour monumental events at our shul such as aufrufs, baby namings and weddings. It doesn't matter how religious you are – any denomination of Judaism is welcome and there is always a minyan. My grandfather Slawin was a very good reader, and he taught all of his grandchildren to read Torah. My brothers and I take turns davening and conducting the services."

B'nai Isaac is an official synagogue with a charitable number. There are no membership dues. The shul opens for weekends during the summer, beginning the first long weekend in July. It has Saturday morning services starting at 9:45 a.m., followed by a kiddush that's sponsored by a volunteer member of the community. Donations are welcome.

"The fact that there was a minyan in the area allowed me the flexibility to leave the city and, at the same time, be able to say Kaddish for my father," Gary Kleinberg, a visitor to the Muskoka area, said. "The congregation was extremely friendly and welcoming, and made me feel very much at home."

Sydney Gangbar, Isaac Jesin's lawyer and longtime friend, owns a cottage in Baysville, Muskoka, close to B'nai Isaac.

"When Isaac indicated he wanted to own a summer place where there was a Jewish community for his family, we introduced Isaac to the Burlmarie Hotel back in 1976," Gangbar said. "At that time, it was a very run down and dilapidated hotel, as the original owners had let it go. However, Isaac had the foresight to see [its] possibilities.

"What started out as a small kiddush after some 80 to 90 people came out regularly on Shabbat morning dating back 35 years, grew into what today is almost a banquet every Sabbath. The synagogue enables people who come to this area to maintain the same [level of observance] as they do in the city," Gangbar added.

Zack Minuk, this writer's son, also talked about why the synagogue and the Jewish community around it are important to him.

"My family travelled from our cottage in Huntsville and took the scenic forest route to synagogue," Zack said. "To my surprise, just a few feet from the car, leaped a female deer. It was an exciting moment, one I wouldn't likely encounter in the city.

"With my bar mitzvah fast approaching, I was looking forward to attending Shabbat services," Zack added, "and the family proudly witnessed my brother, Jordan, get called up to the bimah to dress the Torah.

"Finally, there was the kiddush. Now that was some awesome spread," he said.

"Shabbat is time spent with family, reflecting on how this day is different than any other day of the week," Rachel Shiff said. "It is quieter up here. Everyone is respectful of everybody. It is not as formal as in the city. Breaking bread and praying is a nice custom to maintain even in the country."

"Relax and have a good time," Basia's father, Yirmiyaau Slawin, said many years ago. It's a sentiment that is still shared by Jesin family members today.

Making People's Lives BETTER

Rahimi's ravings suggest Iran isn't rational

"Iranian First Vice-President Mohammad Reza Rahimi condemned Zionists for inciting global drug trade and addiction in a bid to annihilate non-Jewish communities in accordance with talmudic teachings."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

So began a June 26 report by Iran's Fars News Agency of the vice-president's speech at an international anti-drug conference in Tehran that was co-sponsored by the UN.

In his story about this speech for the June 30 Globe and Mail, Paul Koring noted that Rahimi "also accused Zionists of starting the 1917 Russian revolution (although he said they managed to avoid a single Jew being killed), murdering black babies and various other nefarious schemes."

According to the New York Times' Thomas Erdbrink, who reported on the event from the Iranian capital, despite the outlandishness of Rahimi's remarks, all a European delegate could muster (even though he refused to be identified either by name or country), was a mealy-mouthed comment: "This was definitely one of the worst speeches I have heard in my life. My gut reaction was: why are we supporting any co-operation with these people?" He answered himself in consistent fashion: "If we do not support the United Nations on helping Iran fight drugs, voices like the one of Mr. Rahimi will be the only ones out there."

Needless to say, there are no reports of any UN official or European delegate speaking up at the event. Their silence should be as disturbing as Rahimi's comments.

A Reuters report carried in the National Post observed that Rahimi's remarks "seemed unusually inflammatory to western delegates." Appropriately, this prompted a Post reader to ask in a letter to the editor: "Have we reached the point where the anti-Jewish ravings of Iranian leaders have become so common that it takes something extraordinary… to even 'seem' unusual?"

After all, the "usual" inflammatory comments, such as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Holocaust denial, barely cause a stir.

When UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon finally issued a statement about Rahimi, the most he could manage was to call on Iranian officials "to refrain from these kinds of statements," while expressing "deep regret," not condemnation, at such "expessions of hatred and religious intolerance." Last week's CJN editorial called Ban's comments "craven, pusillanimous and entirely inadequate."

Mohammad Reza Rahimi

On June 28, Canada's foreign minister John Baird condemned Rahimi and said that "Canada hopes the international community joins us in speaking out against, and utterly rejecting, such ridiculous and antisemitic assertions."

The point, however, is that Rahimi's remarks, along with those of other Iranian leaders, are not just ridiculous. They are, as history has proved time and again, profoundly dangerous.

Rahimi's remarks also remind us that no one should rest assured that Iran's leaders are "rational actors," as many western academics and pundits believe. These experts, after all, like to claim that Iran's leaders would not launch nuclear weapons against Israel in a first strike, since they would not want to "commit suicide" by inviting an Israeli nuclear retaliation.

One of the most recent examples of this attitude is Kenneth Waltz, professor of political science at Columbia University. In his article "Why Iran Should Get the Bomb" (the cover piece in the July/August 2012 issue of Foreign Affairs), Waltz confidently maintained that "Iranian policy is made not by 'mad mullahs' but by perfectly sane ayatollahs who want to survive like any other leaders. Although Iran's leaders indulge in inflammatory and hateful rhetoric, they show no propensity for self-destruction."

Really?

The strategic analyst Walter Russell Mead reminds us (in his American Interest blog) how unfounded a Waltz-like assumption is.

"Jew-hatred is an irrational passion that overmasters common sense and destroys the ability to perceive one's own best interests… True, risking a retaliatory nuclear strike requires an unusual degree of paranoia and hatred, but enough Israelis have enough historical memory of the irrationality that Jew-hatred brings in its wake that it's unrealistic to expect Israel to accept an Iranian bomb no matter how rational the experts say the mullahs really are."

Outgoing JNF Canada head looks to future

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Joe Rabinovitch really dislikes the word retirement.

So as he prepares to step down at the end of this month as executive vice-president of the Jewish National Fund of Canada (JNF) after 11 years at its helm, he is already planning new projects and new tomorrows.

Deciding to call it a day with JNF seemed entirely in keeping with Rabinovitch's diverse career history going back to 1964. It has included top positions at the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal (now the English Montreal School Board), the Association of Jewish Day Schools, and, just prior to JNF, the YM-YWHA.

At 71, he still exudes a lot of youthful energy.

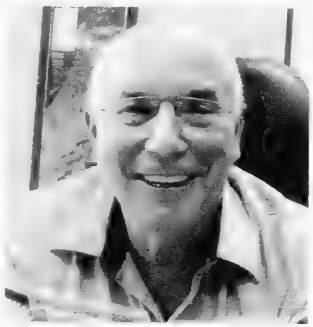
"That's the way I am," Rabinovitch said in an interview last week. "I have always left every job, I think, on top. And I was never afraid to take risks."

Rabinovitch said he was making way for Toronto's Josh Cooper as JNF's executive vice-president. He said the organization is striving to adapt to the times, as every Israel-based fundraising organization in Canada vies to find new donors and as the older generation of "legacy givers" begins to peter out.

"The nature of fundraising is changing drastically," Rabinovitch said.

"The [JNF] head office is still in Montreal, but the offices all across country are taking on enthusiastic younger people and using new ideas and new approaches," especially in the social networking age, in which Facebook, Twitter, Skype, have become essential ways to reach those generations, he added.

As well, Rabinovitch said, "people are much more discerning now about what they want to give," especially in an era when previous "big givers" lived through the founding of Israel and donated as much as they could, but now construction cranes speckle the landscape and show how prosperous Israel is.



Joe Rabinovitch

"Tree-planting and the pushke are still very important for profile-raising, but they are not our most important fundraisers," Rabinovitch said, alluding to Negev Dinner or "legacy" projects.

Rabinovitch said that during his tenure at JNF, he was most proud of the fact that more than 150 JNF Canada projects came to fruition in Israel, representing $50 million from Canada and matching amounts from JNF Israel.

He was also happy that JNF has become a more green organization during his tenure and has launched a large number of local initiatives meant to attract younger generations, including an annual running event co-sponsored by Scotiabank and a floor hockey tournament.

A poignant personal highlight for Rabinovitch was visiting JNF's Montreal Oasis – Be'er Sheva: the Barbara and Stanley Plotnick Family Park.

"The first thing I saw when I got there was a plaque in honour of my parents," Rabinovitch said. "That moment really stayed with me."

New JNF head announces PM as Negev honoree

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The new national executive vice-president of the Jewish National Fund Canada is starting off his tenure with a major announcement: Prime Minister Stephen Harper will be the 2013 Negev Dinner honoree in Toronto.

It's believed to be the first time a sitting prime minister has been honoured at a Negev Dinner. The galas are held annually in cities around the country and recognize Canadians who have shown support for Israel.

"We anticipate that being the largest dinner event the community's ever seen," Josh Cooper said. "The prime minister has agreed to do it. He deserves the honour."

[Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf photo]

The event will be held at the Toronto Metro Convention Centre. More details will be released as the date draws closer.

A spokesperson for Harper said his office has no comment on the event.

Cooper, JNF Canada's current executive director for Toronto, will replace outgoing national vice-president Joe Rabinovitch, 71, as of August.

In an interview with The CJN last week at his Toronto office, Cooper, 42, said he and the Montreal-based Rabinovitch, whom he called "a terrific mentor," have been speaking daily to help ensure a smooth transition.

Cooper plans to revitalize the JNF brand and help Canada's pro-Israel community understand that the JNF is about "so much more" than planting trees – although that remains important.

With 11 offices across Canada and a head office in Montreal, Cooper, who will be based in Toronto, said he plans to visit with all JNF Canada staff and board members to get to know them and gather ideas about how to better promote the organization within the community.

He said marketing strategies and "other national items" would be high on his initial agenda once he takes over as national vice-president.

Another pressing issue is maintaining his organization's existing donor base and "building upon it."

"I feel excited, honoured and fortunate to be able to represent the ultimate Zionist organization," Cooper said. "We're now 111 years young. Many people don't perceive us as the same organization that bought the land to create Israel."

He said JNF Canada is the only Jewish community organization that sends 100 per cent of donations to projects in Israel.

"We've literally impacted 100 per cent of Israel. No other organization has done that," Cooper said, noting that JNF Canada has been or is currently involved in a myriad of infrastructure and environmental projects in the Jewish state.

Many people still associate the JNF name with tree-planting and the traditional blue donation boxes, or pushkes as they're known in Yiddish, but the organization is also a major contributor to Israel's environmental science sector and is a benefactor to numerous schools, synagogues and burgeoning communities.

"People across Canada who want to support Israel should look to JNF," Cooper said.

While there are many other great Jewish organizations in Canada that do "terrific" things domestically, his organization offered the "best value for dollar" for projects in Israel, he said.

The JNF is also focusing on more unique programming to help fundraise for Israeli causes, he said.

As an example, Cooper noted that in 2011 his organization partnered with Ontario's correctional officers to start a motorcycle ride that helps the families of Israeli correctional officers who perished in the 2010 Mount Carmel forest fire while travelling through the forest as part of a convoy that was moving prisoners out of the fire zone.

This year's ride is scheduled for Aug. 12 and has been endorsed by the Ministry of Community Safety. Funds raised will help establish scholarships for the children of the Israeli officers.

For more information on that event and others, visit www.jnf.ca.

"I feel like the luckiest guy in the world doing this [job]. Every day is more exciting than the last. It makes me proud as a Jew to see the work being done in Israel," Cooper said.

AN URGENT CALL TO ACTION FROM BOYCOTT
This August, the General Council of the United Church of Canada will decide whether to adopt a boycott of targeted Israeli communities and products.
If the proposed boycott passes, the United Church will abandon the genuine peace camp and join a broader movement led by anti-Israel activists who seek to undermine the right of the Jewish state to exist.
We cannot be silent bystanders as the United Church targets Israelis for boycott. Now is the time for principled action as a community.
1) Get informed of the facts. Go to www.cija.ca/issues/ucc - and get the facts on why the United Church's proposed new policy does nothing to advance peace.
2) Call, email, or meet with a United Church minister in your neighbourhood. Respectfully share your views. Go to locator.united-church.ca to find a local congregation.
Get involved today. Make the case for the United Church to promote peace and reconciliation – not boycotts.

Shul in talks to share building with federation

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — South Winnipeg's struggling Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun Synagogue, the city's largest Orthodox congregation, is looking to the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg for financial help.

The synagogue board has started negotiations with the federation to possibly turn over ownership of its land and building to the community body, which in return would help the shul with the cost of replacing worn-out boilers and upgrading its 65-year-old facility.

"We are a small congregation," said synagogue president Earl Hershfield. "We only have 97 member families, with 55 to 65 of them active members. We can't raise the amount of money we need to upgrade our building. Therefore, we decided to approach the community at large, as represented by the federation, for help."

Under terms of the proposed agreement, the federation would use the building during the week as a second location for the Asper Campus Daycare, which would open up 60 additional daycare spaces for the Jewish community.

The Herzlia was originally opened in 1955 as a school. It merged with the Adas Yeshurun Synagogue – relocated from the North End – a year later. The Torah Academy also operated a school out of the building in the 1980s.

"We were renting out space for a small daycare [24 spaces]," Hershfield said. "We have spoken to the Rady Centre [which operates the campus daycare] and the federation.

Dr. Earl Hershfield, left, Herzlia's president, with Rabbi Ari Ellis. [Myron Love photo]

All parties agree that this is workable. It would be a win-win situation for all involved and the community at large."

Federation president Israel Ludwig stressed that nothing has been agreed to yet.

"We are not in the business of rescuing synagogues," he said. "We would be sharing costs. Our concern is having a space for expanding our daycare. If we can arrive at an agreement that helps revitalize Winnipeg's major modern Orthodox synagogue, then that would be a bonus."

Ludwig said the federation has received a government grant to open 60 additional daycare spaces, but lacks the room at the Asper Campus, Winnipeg's main Jewish community centre, to expand the existing daycare.

"It's a case of if we don't use it [the grant], we lose it," he said, so the federation has been looking for a building nearby to house the new daycare spaces.

"When the Herzlia came to us with this proposal, we thought that there were some elements that might work for us," Ludwig said.

"We would have to negotiate a cost-sharing arrangement and discuss with [spiritual leader] Rabbi [Ari] Ellis some halachic factors related to issues such as the congregation having to bring Shabbat in early on Fridays in the winter months."

There would also be the question of who would be involved in managing the building from the federation side.

"The federation is not in the business of owning property," Ludwig said. "The Campus Corporation, for example, operates the Asper Campus building. Barry McArton, the Campus Corporation president, will be involved in the negotiations with the Herzlia."

If a deal can be reached, Ludwig sees construction starting this fall at the synagogue on the new daycare, with the work being finished in time for the fall of 2013.

Hershfield envisions the Campus Corporation assuming ownership of the Herzlia property for a period of 25 to 30 years, with the congregation being allowed to continue to use the building rent free.

"[The congregation] would have to set aside money from year to year so that at the end of 25 years, we could either buy back the building or build a new building somewhere else," Hershfield said.

New Baycrest chair aims to improve seniors' lives

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Garry Foster has a simple goal for his three-year term as chair of Baycrest's board of directors.

He wants to improve the lives of seniors.

A chartered accountant and vice-chair of Deloitte, Foster, 61, said in an interview at a Baycrest café that being Baycrest's chair gets him out of the boardroom.

"I get to connect with the people, and really see what's going on here," says Foster, who is married and has two married children and one grandchild.

Foster became acquainted with Baycrest when he took part in a fundraiser. He went on to work on the board's finance committee, he said, after the late Gordon Wolfe, former executive director of Jewish Family & Child, encouraged him to join.

"I was aware of the work it does, but when my mother-in-law became a resident, I saw how amazing the place is. There is caring and compassion, as well as a drive for excellence."

Among his other volunteer work, Foster, who was was recently vice-chair of the Baycrest Foundation, has been a member of Mount Sinai Hospital's board of governors since 1999, president of Jewish Family & Child, and chair of the board of governors of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Garry Foster

Talking about Baycrest, Foster said, "not many places are world leaders in what they do, but Baycrest is in that realm. Its research will transform aging. Our research into cognitive neuroscience is a gift that the Jewish community has given the world.

"I am honoured to be part of a world-class academic health sciences centre. It continues to build an international presence as an innovative leader in care delivery and systems solutions for aging populations."

Recently, he said, Baycrest scientists went to Washington, D.C., to debut the world's first functioning virtual brain, at the annual meeting of the Society for Neuroscience attended by 32,000 scientists and clinicians from around the world.

"The virtual brain can show a simulation of how a normal brain works, as well as the activity pattern after it has had a 'virtual' stroke,'" Foster said.

"The project is now entering Phase II, bringing it a step closer to creating a predictive modelling tool that will change the way we assess and rehabilitate brains that have suffered damage from stroke, epilepsy or the early stages of Alzheimer's, for example. The project team plans to demonstrate the effects of a stroke and epilepsy on the brain to basic and clinical neuroscientists in Europe next spring."

Despite being a world-class facility, he said, Baycrest, which has the largest kosher kitchen in Canada, has never lost its heritage or culture. "The Jewish community is still the bedrock of Baycrest. It is important to stay connected to our roots."

Community support makes Baycrest special, he said. "Money donated goes to improve the life of residents, and of people who come here [for services.]"

Foster said that during his term, he wants to figure out how to use the centre in the best way possible.

"How can we provide services for the community, using this centre as the hub?"

He would like to see the government provide the resources to make it possible for Baycrest to deliver services in people's homes – to keep people at home and live a fruitful life, he said.

"It's all a matter of funding. A lot of people would rather live in their own environment."

He wants to change Baycrest's image, he said, "but not too much. I want to take our research and disseminate it to the world, and I want to be known as the world's leader in cognitive neuroscience. At he same time, though, I still want it to be the Jewish place on Bathurst Street."

The Eicha problem?

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

The public conversation on antisemitism has recently turned to an unlikely source. Read in synagogue on the night of Tisha b'Av (July 28), Eicha has prompted reflection on the degree to which Jews wrongly take responsibility for antisemitism, both today and throughout history.

In February, author Dara Horn gave an online talk in which she questioned our inclination to blame ourselves for our national setbacks. She referred to Eicha, the book of Lamentations, which describes the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem more than 2,500 years ago.

While describing a myriad of Babylonian war crimes, Eicha almost never mentions the perpetrators.

Who are the villains in Eicha? They are the Jews themselves, who brought about their own destruction with their sins. Our sages in the Talmud further cement this idea by explaining that the Second Temple wasn't destroyed by the Romans' hatred for Jews, but by senseless hatred of Jews toward other Jews. Horn calls this tendency of Jews to believe that antisemitism is our own fault the "Eicha problem."

While in its classical form the Eicha problem might be phrased as, "The way to stop antisemitism is to stop sinning against God," it also has secular forms. Chaim Nachman Bialik, in a poem on the 1903 Kishinev Pogroms, criticized traditional Jews for reciting the confession of sins in response to the tragedy. Yet, Bialik's Zionist response was likewise informed by the "Eicha problem." He blames the Jews for not having defended themselves from attack. Either way, Jewish suffering was the Jews' fault.

Horn argues that we're foolish to take responsibility for other's aggression against us. We must stop blaming ourselves.

Rabbinic Reflections

While Horn is right to call attention to how we process national tragedy, Eicha is not the problem. It's part of the solution. Eicha is a symptom of a fundamental Jewish philosophy that has allowed us to survive through history despite our political weakness. We believe that we matter. We believe that our actions matter. We don't believe we're victims. We believe –whether in religious terms through our commitment to God and Torah, or in secular terms through our engagement politically, militarily or diplomatically – that our fate is in our own hands.

To fully assign blame to others is to lose our belief in our own capacity to act. The belief that no matter our enemies' actions, we control our own destiny has allowed us to consider a future that might be different. It has allowed us to hope for better tomorrows.

British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks expressed this idea beautifully in a recent article on Jewish leadership, "At the heart of Judaism are three beliefs about leadership: We are free. We are responsible. And together we can change the world."

Eicha, problem or solution, is a signal of our beliefs about ourselves. To believe that Babylonian, Romans, Germans or Iranians control our fate is to lose our freedom and our responsibility. By taking on our shoulders the heavy burden of our own destruction, we protect our freedom. May we never lose our belief in our power to change our world.

How my tuition plan would work

No column that I've written has received the response that my recent one on how Hebrew day school tuition fees can be substantially and easily reduced without any new money being raised and without funds for other charities being diverted to education.

The combination of foundations spending part of their capital and having it replenished with insurance purchased by day school parents allows us to solve a major crisis now while maintaining and even increasing funds for the future.

I'd like to add a further perspective as we move toward a solution. As The CJN has reported, enrolment at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy has dropped by some 160 students over the past three years. That's expected to grow to 200 fewer students by the fall. While some attribute the drop to demographics, my own research shows that finances play a much greater role.

While Generation X may have had slightly fewer kids than the Baby Boomers, Toronto has been, and continues to be, a magnet for Jewish immigration from all over the world. The Jewish community today is larger than it was 15 years ago, so enrolment should be going up, not down. Demographics do play a role – in the decision of countless committed parents to have fewer children. As many have noted, day school tuition is the best form of birth control.

TanenbaumCHAT's own research shows that 96 per cent of its graduates marry Jews (similar studies across North America peg the rate at just over 90 per cent). For students attending public school, the intermarriage rate is more than 50 per cent. While the ultimate goal is "Birthright Education" – free education for every Jewish child – we'll start with a goal of a 50 per cent cut in tuition.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Assuming that such savings would entice many to opt for a day school education, this means that for every $1 million dedicated to tuition reduction – money that would be returned with "interest" – four Jews who would otherwise have intermarried would marry Jews.

Without getting into the intricacies of insurance, here's a simplified example of how this could work: a family with four children in day schools has $800,000 of tuition to look forward to. In return for a tuition loan of $500,000 over 18 years, the couple buys $2,000,000 in life insurance, payable to the foundation funding the tuition reduction. If they purchase the insurance when the husband is 40 and the wife 37, it will cost them about $120,000 over those same 18 years while their kids are in school (substantially less if they purchase the insurance, say, when they are 30 and 27), after which no more premiums would be necessary. The family saves some $380,000 and the charity receives four times the money it loaned to be used for future charitable giving. Even if the couple lives into their nineties, that's a return of about 2.5 per cent compounded annually – much higher than a government-guaranteed bond.

The much greater return is an investment in the Jewish future – in guaranteeing future Jewish children will have access to Jewish education, and in having a cadre of committed Jews to strengthen our community.

Marking the end of another 7-1/2 years of Talmud study

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

On Aug. 2, tens of thousands of Jews around the world will complete the daf yomi cycle of studying the entire Babylonian Talmud. I will be among them. While the Talmud is the core text of rabbinic Judaism, for centuries, many learned Jews lived long and intellectually productive Jewish lives without actually studying every page of it. In the traditional yeshivah method of studying, a page can be studied for weeks. At that rate, it would take many lifetimes to complete the 5,200 plus pages (or more than 2,600 folios, a folio being the two sides of a page) of the Talmud.

At the World Congress of the haredi (ultra-Orthodox) organization Agudath Israel in 1923, Rabbi Meir Shapiro advanced the novel idea of encouraging Jews to study one folio (daf) of Talmud daily (yomi) on a fixed schedule. All studiers would be literally on the same page every day and would complete the Talmud in 7-1/2 years. In the first few cycles, few people were attracted, but since then, more and more Jews have been participating. Almost every Orthodox synagogue seems to have at least one daf yomi group nowadays. You can attend daf classes online by great Talmud scholars such as Rabbi Dov Linzer, a talented teacher who is head of the open Orthodox Yeshivat Chovevei Torah. Available in audio podcasts or video, live or archived or on YouTube, Rabbi Linzer teaches and interacts with a class of women and men in an Orthodox synagogue in the Bronx (http://www.the-daf.com). For those who (like me) prefer low-tech resources, we have been blessed in recent decades with excellent books that make the daf more comprehensible. (More on the newest resource, the Koren-Steinsaltz English Talmud, in an upcoming review.)

Completing the daf cycle makes me feel both accomplished and humble. The accomplishment is obvious – sticking with a project for 7-1/2 years is difficult, especially when it involves studying obscure texts that often deal with the minutiae of laws that are not part of today's practice of Judaism (ritual impurity, animal sacrifices, etc.). The humility comes from realizing that there is so much more to learn before you can feel that you have mastered the Talmud. I am filled with admiration for the few rabbis and scholars who have. Of all the resources in print and on the Internet, the most crucial for me these last 7-1/2 years has been the Talmud commentary of Rashi (1040-1105), written almost 1,000 years ago. I never cease to be amazed at how Rashi figures out where the Talmudic text is going to puzzle a reader like me and then solves my puzzlement with a few terse words of commentary.

A complete set of the Babylonian Talmud

How worthwhile is the daf yomi enterprise? Jewish educators are split. Critics point out that Rabbi Shapiro presumed that those studying the daf yomi would already have advanced text skills. For them, he thought it worthwhile to cover pages quickly, thus reviewing the major and minor issues of the Talmud. But often today, less knowledgeable Jews make up the bulk of daf yomi participants. Many assemble in synagogues for a 45-minute group lecture each day. The group leaders race through the texts, but don't teach skills. Sadly, it's possible to attend daf yomi classes for 7-1/2 years and learn neither talmudic Aramaic nor how to figure out the talmudic text on your own. Were the classes structured differently – without the need of covering a folio a day – imagine what skills could be learned in 2,000 hours of instruction! (University language teachers claim that 300 hours of classroom instruction over a period of three or four years is enough to take a student from no knowledge of a language to near fluency.) Supporters of daf yomi counter that those who attend are attracted by the experience of being part of a group with a holy mission and are not concerned that the learning outcomes are limited.

To mark the completion of the Talmud (siyum ha-Shas), Agudath Israel is organizing events around the world on Aug. 1. The main event is at MetLife Stadium in New Jersey. Canadians can join in via satellite from Toronto's Sony Centre for the Performing Arts. I'm told that it's very moving to be part of these mass celebrations of Talmud learning. The Toronto event is advertised as reflecting the unity of the Jewish people. On a certain level, this is true, as the event will probably attract people from all branches of the often fractious haredi world. Speeches, judging from descriptions of past events, will be in Yiddish and English. Some modern Orthodox Jews will also attend. Women will be present, but they will be seated separately (in Toronto, in balconies), and none will speak. I'm told that at previous such events, rabbis praised women for encouraging and enabling their husbands and sons to study Talmud, but the idea of women themselves studying Talmud was not on the event's radar. (When I was young, virtually no women studied Talmud. In the last three decades, more and more modern Orthodox women are pursuing intense Talmud study.)

The haredi flavour of a siyum ha-Shas is understandable, as the initiators and many of the learners are haredim. But a celebration of Jewish learning in 2012 that excludes women or turns them into silent spectators does not appeal to me. Recently, though, I learned that both in New York and in Israel, modern Orthodox organizations are making plans for additional siyum ha-Shas events with the active participation of both women and men. The event in New York (one of whose co-sponsors is Toronto's Torah in Motion) takes place on the evening of Aug. 6, at Congregation Shearith Israel (the Spanish Portuguese Synagogue) and I will be one of the speakers. (See the event website www.siyumhashas12.com.) Who knows? Maybe 7-172 years from now there will be an inclusive siyum ha-Shas in Canada, too!

And yes, I am hoping to begin the Talmud again on Aug. 3.

Guest Voice

Robert Sarner

With the much-anticipated 2012 Summer Olympics soon to kick off in London, there's great speculation in Canada over how our athletes will fare at the Games. While I hope they'll be triumphant, Canada already deserves a gold medal for an Olympic-related action off the field, an action that should be the source of great pride for all those who still subscribe to the original, albeit tarnished, ideals of the Olympics.

A few weeks ago, Canada became the first country to officially call on the International Olympic Committee (IOC) to hold a minute of silence at the Games in memory of the 11 Israeli athletes and coaches slain by Palestinian terrorists at the Munich Olympics in 1972. The vote in Parliament, passed unanimously, came after two Canadian cabinet ministers wrote to IOC president Jacques Rogge in support of a formal commemoration of the murdered sportsmen on the 40th anniversary of the massacre.

Since Israel made its request to the IOC in April on behalf of families of the victims, a growing number of people around the world have raised their voices for such a long-overdue gesture. In late June, others followed Canada's lead as the U.S. Senate and the Australian House of Representatives both unanimously passed resolutions calling on the IOC to reverse its position. Germany's foreign minister also weighed in similarly.

So far, true to form, the IOC will hear none of it. Over the years, it has steadfastly refused proposals from the athletes' relatives for a minute of silence at the Games, saying it would politicize the Games. This despite politics often being inextricably linked to the Olympics. At the 2008 and 2004 Olympics, Iran and Syria ordered their athletes not to compete against their Israeli counterparts in protest of the Jewish state, without the IOC doing anything. At the 2002 Winter Olympics, the IOC allowed the U.S. team to walk in the opening ceremonies with a flag recovered from the ruins of the 9/11 terrorist attacks on New York. In 1936, the IOC yielded to Hitler as he stage-managed the Berlin Games to glorify Nazi Germany.

It's also worth noting the IOC has previously remembered deceased Olympic athletes during the Games. Two years ago at the Vancouver Olympics, a moment of silence was held during the opening ceremony for a Georgian luge competitor who died during a training accident.

The IOC's position on the Israeli athletes is a travesty of the values it claims to uphold. It's consistent with the organization's time-honoured hypocrisy and corruption, and its draconian, Orwellian copyright enforcement.

With its greedy servitude to corporate money and political interests, including some of the world's worst dictatorships, the IOC seems to have forgotten that its priority is supposed to be the athletes. This latest disgrace adds to the litany of IOC transgressions spanning decades. Little wonder there's so much disillusionment over the Olympics and cynicism at the sight of the shamelessly overcommercialzed five rings.

As columnist Rosie DiManno wrote so trenchantly in a recent column in the Toronto Star: "Four decades after the Munich Massacre, the Lords of the Rings continue to act as if 11 Israelis were never murdered by Palestinian terrorists smack in the middle of their gaudy sports spectacle – an atrocity that was not allowed to interfere with those 1972 Games, which proceeded as if nothing untoward had happened. Through nine Summer Olympiads since, the IOC has staunchly refused to hold any official observance for the slain Israelis. They talk a good game – the global community of athletes, the spirit of brotherhood and peaceful competition – but it is hokum, the mendacity of satraps with selective amnesia and slippery virtue."

It's heartening to see such moral outrage mounting. With the clock ticking down to the opening ceremonies in London on July 27, an international movement is now gaining ground to get the IOC to reverse its position. In addition to a global online petition that's attracted 85,000 signatures, public officials in half a dozen countries have come out in favour of the commemoration of the Israeli athletes. With any luck, it will move the IOC to finally see the light and do the right thing. It would make for what would likely be the most poignant, most dignified minute at the London Olympics.

U of T dean of dentistry rocking into retirement

Michelle Bitran
Intern

University of Toronto dean of dentistry Dr. David Mock is a man of firsts. He is the first Jewish dean of the department, and, after serving two back-to-back terms as dean since 2001, he is very likely the first to receive a rocking chair at his retirement tribute.

When Mock was told that U of T would create a chair in his honour, he joked that he would like it to be a rocking chair. To his surprise, he received both the academic honour and the item of furniture.

"We're going to take it to the cottage," Mock said with a laugh, when asked what he would do with the unusual gift.

Mock's tribute was held at the U of T Faculty Club on June 28. His colleagues, friends and family, who had come from as far away as Israel, attended the event, which featured refreshments, music and a farewell video tribute.

Mock was presented with an official portrait, as well as a plaque to recognize his work. Dr. Harinder Sandhu, the director of the Schulich dentistry program at University of Western Ontario, presented the plaque.

"I'm very, very proud of my faculty," said Mock, who is a specialist in oral pathology and oral medicine. He has been at U of T, first as a student and later as a professor, virtually continuously since the first year of his undergraduate degree in 1963.

When he became dean of dentistry in 2001, one of the first things Mock did was to hang a mezuzah in the doorway of his office. "I felt it was an indication of the times and that things have gotten better," he said of his appointment as a Jewish dean. Mock said as a student, he witnessed unofficial forms of antisemitism and racism that he says are no longer present at the university.

Prior to Mock's first term as dean, there had only been a Jewish interim dean of dentistry, but not a full-term one. Mock will be succeeded by Dr. Daniel Haas, who is also Jewish.

U of T president Dr. David Naylor, a friend and colleague of Mock's, spoke at the reception, sharing fond memories of working with the former dean. "This is a man who has given his life in many ways to advancing this profession and this institution," Naylor said of Mock.

Also at the tribute, it was announced that a fellow graduate of U of T's dental school, Mark Nusbaum, and his wife, Edith, would establish an endowed fund in Mock's honour to support graduate students.

Mock chose to share his tribute with his wife, Karen, a well-known human rights consultant. At the Faculty Club, Karen Mock was presented with the Queen's Diamond Jubilee Medal for her service to the community.

"It's been wonderful to share the journey," she said of both their career accomplishments. The Mocks celebrate their 45th wedding anniversary this December.

Though Mock is on his way to retirement, he said he will continue with some part-time teaching as well as his work at Mount Sinai Hospital, both passions that he is not ready to leave behind just yet.

"I will do the things that I enjoy, and I won't do the things I don't enjoy," he said with a laugh.

100% ISRAEL

Since its founding in 1901, Jewish National Fund/Keren Kayemeth Le'Yisrael (JNF) has been committed to building Israel's future as well as responding in times of crisis and need.
Located in Toronto, Ontario, we are searching for an experienced:

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

The successful candidate is responsible for the overall coordination, design and implementation of programs, public activities and fundraising for the Toronto Region. The challenge of this opportunity is to marshal JNF's full organizational and philanthropic potential in order to engage, inspire and strengthen the Jewish community throughout Toronto and highlight JNF's impact on Israel and Jews overseas. This individual will be responsible for providing leadership to the JNF Toronto office staff and fostering a high performance culture and maintain good relations with staff leadership of synagogues, fraternal organizations, Jewish community organizations and other volunteer groups.

We are looking for someone who has a minimum of ten years of relevant experience with at least five years at a high level of management in a complex organization, preferably with some time spent as an Executive Director or General Manager or comparable position. Prior experience with fundraising and major gift cultivation and solicitation is required. The ideal candidate will have a combination of business/managerial knowledge and exposure to non-for-profit organizations in a lay or professional role. A commitment to Israel and Jewish values preferred.

Church urged to reject boycott

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Nine Canadian senators sent a joint letter to the United Church of Canada Moderator Mardi Tindal in late June warning her that a deep schism between the Jewish and Protestant communities could emerge if the church adopts a controversial boycott proposal on Israel at its general council in Ottawa next month.

The senators, all of whom are United Church members, urged the church to reject a proposal being brought forward by its Working Group on Israel Palestine Policy that asks the church to boycott all products made in West Bank settlements, but stops short of asking for a total boycott of all Israeli goods.

Senator Nancy Ruth sent the letter from her office. Its co-signatories are senators Bert Brown, Yonah Martin, Dennis Patterson, Carolyn Stewart Olsen, Jim Munson, George Baker, James Cowan and Elizabeth Hubley.

They asked the church to remember that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is complex. "Humility would dictate that we approach this matter with care and respect to all parties," they wrote.

The senators called the boycott proposal "strange" and "baffling" and said the Jewish community worldwide and Israelis won't understand any distinction the working group makes between boycotting products from Israeli settlements versus Israel as a whole.

"What will be made clear to them is that the United Church has chosen sides, declaring Israel guilty and the Palestinians the only injured party," they said.

The senators also rebuked the church's working group for failing in its proposal to "mention a single expectation of the Palestinians" in its recommendations.

"To put it bluntly, the church cannot maintain credibility in criticizing Israeli policies… while relieving the Palestinian leadership of its own duty to advance peace," they wrote.

The senators asked Tindal to use her position as moderator to denounce the boycott proposal and remind church leaders that peace between Israelis and Palestinians requires that both sides "make the concessions necessary to end the conflict that has harmed so many."

The United Church posted the letter on its website last week and responded with letters from both Tindal and Rev. Bruce Gregersen, head of the church's working group on Palestine, to Ruth and the other senators on July 3.

The United Church is Canada's largest Protestant denomination. It has 650,000 members, but more than 2.5 million people identify themselves as followers.

In her letter, Tindal thanked the senators for expressing their concerns and acknowledged the upcoming challenge to the Jewish-United Church relationship.

She said she visited "Israel Palestine" last year with the working group, but withdrew from the group once it started deliberations on how to write up its report "recognizing the need to remain neutral and unattached to its recommendations, given that I will be presiding during the council." As such, she said it would be inappropriate for her to make any comment on the report prior to the general council.

Haredim volunteer before law expires

Yair Ettinger
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The uncertainty surrounding the aftermath of the Tal Law's Aug. 1 expiry has driven a record number of haredi men to volunteer for the national service program.

Some 200 men packed Jerusalem's Yad Sarah conference hall July 5, constituting the largest contingent ever to join the program, launched in 2008 as an alternative to yeshiva students' military service. The men, coming from the Lithuanian, Sephardi and especially chassidic factions of the haredi community, will be joining the 1,860 haredi men currently in the national service.

"Everyone here realizes that once the Tal Law expires, the terms might worsen for the volunteers," said Yisrael Meir Ravitz of the National Civilian Service administration for haredim.

Some men who had been planning to join the service in the next few years changed their mind in view of the current uncertainty and have joined now, he said.

Sar-Shalom Gerbi, the administration's director general, said the volunteers' numbers have increased consistently over the years.

"The service is not a melting pot, we want whoever enters [the program] haredi to remain haredi," Gerbi told the 200 volunteers at the conference.

Until about 1-1/2 years ago, it was difficult to find haredi volunteers, apart from yeshiva dropouts and young people on the fringes of haredi society, to fill the few national service slots allotted to haredim. Now the haredi establishment has changed its attitude and appears to be warming up to the program.

Haredi Jew serving in an elite IDF sniper unit [Israel Sun photo]

"Until recently they used to call volunteers to the national service brats and punks. Today the best of my kollel [yeshiva for married men] are here," said a Gerrer Chassid.

"If there were more places, thousands more haredim would join the national service," he says.

Asked if they came for ideological reasons, he says: "We're all practical people, we all want to work. This isn't Zionism. We're no better than the soldiers serving in the Army Radio."

Like the national service, the Netzah Yehuda Battalion in the IDF's Kfir Brigade barely fills the 100 places it has.

Many of the new volunteers will be employed by local authorities, the Ministry for Pensioners Affairs and even Yad Vashem, where they will advise haredi Holocaust survivors about their rights and take their testimonies, officials said.

The civilian national service is one of the volunteer programs set up in the wake of the Tal Law, in addition to the Netzah Yehuda Battalion and Shahar, an IDF project to train haredi men in technological professions. The current law exempts men who serve in the national service for at least a year from military service. It also entitles them to various financial benefits during the service and upon their discharge. Above all, they are permitted to work, or more accurately, to work legally.

The High Court of Justice, which declared the Tal Law unconstitutional earlier this year, dedicated extensive parts of its ruling to the flaws in the national service. "Implementing this project was paved with difficulties. In reality, although the law deferring [military] service was enacted in 2002, the national service administration was only formed in 2007 and started operating only in March 2008," then-Supreme Court president Dorit Beinisch wrote in her ruling.

Haredi volunteers to the national service, most of them married men, are allowed to serve one year of eight-hour work days, or two years at four hours a day.

MK Yohanan Plesner, who drafted recommendations for an alternative to the Tal Law, suggests prolonging the service, as the High Court recommended. Plesner proposed extending the national service for haredi men gradually from 12 to 18 months of full-time work (40 hours a week), or 24 months of part-time work (30 hours a week). "Five years after the law comes into effect [the government will] examine extending [the term] gradually to 24 months of full-time work, subject to the follow-up committee's recommendation and according to the number of volunteers," he wrote.

German hospital stops religious circumcisions

JTA

COLOGNE — A German Jewish hospital has stopped allowing religious circumcisions in light of a court decision defining them as causing grievous bodily harm to young boys.

Last month's ruling by a Cologne district court did not outlaw circumcision, but still the Jewish Hospital in Berlin decided to stop allowing religious circumcisions, according to Ynet. Doctors may still perform circumcisions for medical reasons.

"We performed circumcisions on a regular basis until this ruling and we no longer have the legal freedom to do it," hospital spokesperson Gerhard Nerlich told Ynet.

Germany's foreign minister, meanwhile, sought to dispel "doubts arising internationally about religious tolerance in Germany."

"The free exercise of religion is protected in Germany. That includes religious traditions," Guido Westerwelle said in a statement, according to the Associated Press.

German Jewish and Muslim leaders have criticized the Cologne ruling, which said the "fundamental right of the child to bodily integrity outweighed the fundamental rights of the parents." Dieter Graumann, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, called it "outrageous and insensitive."

Israel's right to the land undisputed

"Occupiers," "Palestinian lands," "Arab east Jerusalem," "contrary to international law."

These catch phrases, and others with similar implications, have been used incessantly – not merely by Arab or Muslim sources, but by U.S. President Barack Obama, EU Foreign Secretary Catherine Ashton and countless writers and commentators. They have become part of the standard lexicon to decry Israel's territorial position since 1967 and after. The 1967 armistice line known as the "Green Line" has magically and cavalierly also been referred to as a "border."

Guest Voice

Donald Carr

The fallacy of this almost universally accepted usage was the subject of a conference in Israel on the status of Jerusalem under international law and future options for that city.

According to Jacques Gauthier, an international lawyer from Toronto whose presentation was the centrepiece of the conference, legal title to what was Palestine in 1919 (the current State of Israel; Gaza; the West Bank, also known as Judea and Samaria; and Jordan) belongs exclusively to the Jewish People, as represented today by the State of Israel.

Gauthier's conclusion has never been refuted in any accepted analysis of international law. It was first presented by Howard Grief, an Israeli lawyer who made aliyah from Montreal many years ago, in an article written in 2004. However, it has never been researched as carefully and with such detail and references as by Gauthier.

Israeli (Jewish) sovereignty arises through a series of declarations and international treaties that followed the defeat of Germany and its allies at the end of World War I.

The chronology, in brief, is as follows:

1. The 1917 Balfour Declaration of the British Government declared the intention of Britain to create a "national home for the Jewish People" in Palestine.

2. Prof. Ian Brownlie said in his Principles of Public International Law: "After the defeat of the Central Powers, the leading victor states assumed a 'Power of Disposition' to be exercised jointly over the territory of the defeated states."

As a result of the exercise of that power, huge tracts of national lands in Europe were ceded by the defeated countries. These included what are known as Poland, Lithuania, Latvia, Finland, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Thrace and part of Turkey. Those dispositions were confirmed by treaties signed by the defeated states. Nobody has ever questioned the rights thus created.

In the Middle East, the Arab peoples' claims were submitted by Emir Feisal to the "Principal Allied Powers" (Britain, the United States, Japan, Italy and France) at the Paris Peace Conference. The Jewish claims were submitted by Chaim Weizmann.

3. The claims of the Arabs were satisfied by a Mandate allocated to France, being the territory that later became Syria and Lebanon, and by a Mandate to Britain of lands that later became Iraq.

The claims made by the Jews resulted in a Mandate for Palestine, given to Britain. That Mandate repeated explicitly the operative parts of the Balfour Declaration. The Mandate included all of the lands to the west of the Jordan River as well as the huge territory that lay to the east of that river. Britain was to hold all of those lands in trust for a national home for the Jewish people. Britain's Mandate was adopted by the Supreme Council of Allied Powers at the San Remo Conference in April 1920. It was confirmed by the Treaty of Sevres, Aug. 10, 1920. Turkey was a party to that treaty.

4. Upon the creation of the League of Nations in July 1922, Article 22 of its covenant reconfirmed the French Mandate and the British Mandate relating to Iraq.

However, in 1921, acceding to further claims by Emir Feisal, Britain proposed to lop off that part of Palestine to the east of the Jordan River to create Trans-Jordan, later known as Jordan.

On behalf of the Arabs, Feisal, formally and in writing, abandoned any claims to the lands west of the Jordan River, then known as West Palestine. The League of Nations approved that dismemberment of Palestine. The Jews were impotent to do anything about it.

5. In Article 80 of its charter, the United Nations confirmed the then-existing mandates, thereby recognizing Jewish sovereignty to the whole of Palestine west of the Jordan River.

Subsequently, of course, came the Partition Plan, adopted by the United Nations and accepted by the Jewish People, the creation of the State of Israel, the 1948 war, Security Council Resolution 242, the later wars, the peace treaties with Jordan and Egypt, the disengagement agreements with Syria after the 1967 war and the Oslo accord.

In January 1919, following the First World War, Chaim Weizmann, left, and Emir Feisal agreed upon a set of principles to ensure that both Zionist and Arab aspirations would be met in a new unfolding Middle East.

It is argued that by accepting the partition of Palestine and engaging in the subsequent "arrangements," Israel gave up its legal rights to lands west of the Jordan, other than those constituting what is recognized generally as Israel, including Jerusalem. It should be pointed out, however, that all of the Arab states, as well as representatives of the Palestinian Arabs, either rejected or, with respect to the Oslo accord, breached so many of its provisions that Israel's legal rights, if they ever were surrendered, have not been lost, or were revived.

Jerusalem, no matter how that city is defined territorially, presents a somewhat different set of issues, as Israel has never given up any claims to it and has, indeed, formally annexed large parts of it.

China to build Eilat railway

Israel and China signed an agreement to build the Eilat railway and other projects. Israeli Minister of Transport Yisrael Katz, who headed a 12-member delegation of officials and executives to China, signed the document with Chinese Minister of Transport Li Shenglin in Beijing. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has declared the Eilat railway a national priority project. The Eilat line will be 180 kilometres long. Officials hope it will cut travel time between Tel Aviv and Eilat to two hours. It will cost at least 20 billion shekels, Globes reported.

Segregation sign removed

A sign calling for women to refrain from using sidewalks in order to avoid contact with men was removed from a neighbourhood in Beit Shemesh. The sign was taken down after a complaint from a female city resident who told Ynet news that she had been the victim of an attack for not dressing modestly in the past, when a rock was thrown at her head by a haredi man. City inspectors removed the sign in an effort to avoid confrontation. The signs had been removed last summer but were reportedly replaced. Beit Shemesh, 30 kilometres west of Jerusalem, has been the site of violence against women by extremist haredi men over the past several months.

Yigal Amir out of solitary

Yigal Amir, the assassin of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, will be let out of solitary confinement after 16 years. An Israel Prison Service committee decided to integrate Amir into the general prison population. His case is reviewed by a prison committee every six months. He will now be allowed to watch TV and to make more frequent phone calls. In February, an Israeli court ordered the Prison Service to let Amir pray with up to three prisoners each day. Amir has been in prison since 1995 and is serving a life sentence for Rabin's murder on Nov. 5 of that year. He has been in solitary confinement the entire time because of fears he'll spread his ideology to other inmates and that his life could be in danger from other prisoners.

Scientists grow pot, minus high

Israeli researchers say they have developed a cannabis plant that gives no high. The research firm, called Tikun Olam, operates a marijuana plantation in northern Israel, the Jerusalem Post reported. Medical marijuana has been legal in Israel since 1993, although recreational use is illegal. Tikun Olam says its new marijuana plant doesn't contain THC, the constituent that gives users a high. But it still contains cannabidiol, which doctors say can aid the treatment of a variety of illnesses. The Post, citing the Healthy Ministry, reported that cannabis is used to treat 9,000 people in Israel. "Sometimes the high is not always what they need," Zack Klein, head of development at Tikun Olam, said. "Sometimes it is an unwanted side effect. For some of the people it's not even pleasant."

Authors reveal heroism of iconic cyclist

"He was also known as being stubborn and strong."

Another factor influencing his actions was the role of the Catholic Church. Cardinal Elia Dalla Costa approached him in late 1943, after the Nazis occupied Italy, to help a clandestine network that hid Jews, Aili said.

Bartali was brought up a Catholic, and "he respected him and he listened," Aili said. "He loved Italy and racing for Italy, but he was distraught that Italy had turned into a nightmare place with fascist policies."

Risking his life – he would have been considered a traitor and his family might have been in jeopardy if he had been caught – Bartali agreed to help.

He passed through police checkpoints fairly easily, under the pretext that he was training. Usually, his fame made it easy to do so, but once, near the end of the war, "he had a close call," Aili said. "He was arrested by a bloodthirsty police chief" who was known for using electric shocks to torture his victims.

Bartali was held for three days on suspicion of smuggling food. His alibi was that he was doing relief work for the church.

He was released only because a guard, who was also a fan, stood up for him, Aili said.

Bartali's humanitarian efforts were known within the Italian Jewish community after the war, "but it was not widely known at all," she said.

Bartali did not want to talk about it – his first cousin had been "taken away," Andres said, and his experience was "too raw," Aili added.

But at least one first-hand witness was available to tell his part of the story.

Giorgio Goldenberg was a youngster when the war broke out. He now lives in Tel Aviv. "He knew Bartali" and adored him as a cycling champ, Andres said.

In 1941, before the Nazi occupation, he was living in a village outside Florence. Bartali came for a visit that brought out the whole town to see him. It turned out that Bartali had known Goldenberg's father, and to the amazement of all present, he gave Giorgio a small bike and a signed publicity photo, addressed to "Goldenberg Giorgio."

Goldenberg so revered Bartali that he kept the precious souvenir throughout the war, even while being hidden in a Catholic orphanage under the Italian name "Goldini."

"At that time, everyone was hiding their Jewish identity," Andres said. "He kept the picture… showing his real name and not his gentile alias."

After the war, Bartali put his wartime activities behind him. "He focused on returning to his cycling glory. He wanted his legacy in Italy to be as a cyclist," Andres said.

Ten years after he won his first Tour de France, the chain-smoking, wine-drinking cyclist won his second at age 34. It cemented his position as a cycling legend, and the 10-year span is still the record for most time between victories.

Andres, a cycling fan, was intrigued by Bartali when, standing on the sidelines at the Tour de France, people were amazed that Lance Armstrong was able to win the event in his 30s.

A historical researcher, Andres began examining Bartali's life, and Aili, a journalist who was helping put together an anthology that examined the Holocaust, agreed to help him.

Their book is the first that looks beyond Bartali's sporting exploits and considers the personal heroism he displayed in risking his life to save others.

After the war, he made a comeback, and during the 1948 Tour de France, an assassination attempt in Rome led to political protests and riots. Bartali persevered in the race and won in a way that inspired people back home.

"Cycling was seen as transcending politics and uniting the country," Aili said.

Just as Bartali's father would have wanted.

PA's responses 'not entirely satisfying'

He added the impetus for CIJA's visit was a trilateral invitation by the PA, Israeli and Canadian governments.

The trip also served as an opportunity for CIJA to raise concerns with the PA about issues regarding incitement of hatred against Jews and Israelis that have become "toxically" entrenched in both the Palestinian media and its educational systems, Fogel said.

He said he and Koschitzky also asked PA representatives why they don't simply recognize Israel as a Jewish state.

The PA's responses were "not entirely satisfying," he said.

"On issues like incitement, [the PA] diminish both their own responsibility for what's being broadcast and what messages are being conveyed to the Palestinian people. And their rebuttal is always, 'Well, there's incitement on Israel's part, too.'"

Fogel said that in his opinion, there is no equivalence between incitement by some "hard-line" individuals in Israel and a state-sponsored system of incitement by the PA.

Asked about the possibility of CIJA being officially sanctioned by the Canadian government to be part of the effort to restart the peace process, Fogel said his organization has been "encouraged [by Canada] to take this kind of role."

"Without exaggerating our influence or importance, we see ourselves as genuinely trying to offer whatever modest contribution we can make to the peace process and to greater understanding," Fogel said.

On this latest visit, CIJA had hoped to identify some potential role Canada could play in the peace process. While that role has yet to be established, he said both the PA and Israel "expressed interest in Canada taking a more vigorous role in the talks."

Fogel said CIJA will "formally communicate" its findings to Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird shortly.

Rick Roth, a spokesperson for Baird said that the department of foreign affairs has "a great and ongoing relationship with CIJA, however, we are not going to go into the specifics of our discussions."

In 2007, Ottawa announced it would provide $300 million over five years to help the Palestinian people reduce levels of poverty, increase security, shore up governance, increase prosperity and engage in the peace process.

Entrepreneurs publish guide for summer fun

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

You know that farm, the one that's downtown, in Cabbagetown, the one with the farm animals – what's it called?

Isn't there a white-water rafting place on the Ottawa River? How do you get in touch with them?

Or that apple farm, the one down the 401, where you pick your own apples and the kids get to play on slides and roll around in the hay – where is it exactly?

If you're a parent with small kids looking to keep them busy, or you have friends in from out of town looking for something special to do, you've probably struggled with those very questions and many more.

There are hundreds, if not thousands of activities available in and around Toronto, but who can keep track of them all and which is the best choice?

There may not yet be "an app for that," so a couple of aggressive entrepreneurs have come up with a solution that brings together old and new technologies.

Elisa Palter and Shari Wert recently published their Summer Fun Guide, Ontario's Comprehensive Guide to Year-Round Fun. They also launched a website, www.SummerFunGuide.ca, which contains all the information found in the printed guide along with updates to keep it current.

Much of it is family oriented – as in Riverdale Farm and Chudleigh's – but there are also listings for adult activities like casinos and horse racing.

Activities are divided into 16 categories in seven regions, and they range from the commonplace to those that are a bit off the wall. Of course, there are the festivals, fairs and shows that attract thousands every summer, plus boat and train excursions. But there's also information about a helicopter tour of Ontario, the location of the highest bungee jump in the province and the address for the St. Mary's Quarry, which is today the largest pool in Ontario. "There are a lot of cool things here," Palter said.

Though the website was launched about a year ago, the print version of the guide came out only in May. Palter and Wert had 250,000 copies printed and they're available in numerous locations across the province. ONroute, the service centres on Highway 401 is the guide's main sponsor and it stocks the directory, as do hotels, restaurants, attractions and other venues.

The partners were pretty confident the guide would be a hot seller. In 1994, they had teamed up to produce Help! We've Got Kids, a print and now Internet directory. They sold it in 2009.

"We loved dealing with the clowns," Palter said.

"But it's 17 years, time to move on," Wert added.

Shari Wert, left, and Elisa Palter

In the years between the two businesses, Wert and Palter each celebrated bar or bat mitzvahs.

"Afterwards, we said, 'what now?'" Wert said.

Hence, the Summer Fun Guide.

Over the years, businesses became comfortable advertising in their first directory and they developed the credibility they needed when they approached them with the idea for a new guide.

Business school graduates, Palter and Wert conducted their own market research, financial analysis and marketing plan and sunk their own money into the fun guide.

It's a results-oriented business, they said.

"It has to drive the business for advertisers," Wert explained.

Opening the website allowed potential customers to see how their ads looked and, along with their track record of more than 17 years, they built a level of credibility for the product.

So far, advertisers are comfortable with the product and they've managed an 80 per cent retention rate, Palter said.

"Most people renew because our intention is to make it work. You always have to keep the end-user in mind. So far, the feedback has been positive," Wert said.

In the first months of operation, the website generated 15,000 visits a month, and that number has climbed to 40,000 monthly hits.

The partners won't reveal their revenues, but Palter and Wert acknowledge it's in the six figures. Revenue is based on fees for boxed and display ads.

Printing the booklet and setting up the business are the biggest costs. "Margins in the directory business are very high," Palter said, "more than 50 per cent."

"If you do everything right and make it work, and advertisers and readers are happy, then it can be an annuity" business, Palter said.

And, there's room for growth. Unlike Help? We've Got Kids, which was aimed at something of a niche market, the fun guide appeals to people at all stages of life. They plan to expand it from 80 pages to 120 next year.

"One of the things we learned was to broaden our target market," in terms of both demographic and region, Wert said.

An important consideration today, as it was 18 year ago, was to find a way to use their business skills while raising a family.

"We were looking for balance," Wert said.

"Our goal was to be in business and to have balance in our lives," Palter said. "But we're not dabbling."

"We're working our Jewish butts off," Wert added.

New master plan for Haifa port area: The Haifa port has a new master plan that combines an international port for shipping and a tourist centre. The National Planning and Building Council approved the plan last week as part of the detailed national master plan. That will allow the city to start issuing building permits after the regional planning committee reviews the plan, comments and considers any public objections. One purpose of the new plan is to open the city to the sea.

Diamond exports down sharply: The global economic crisis is having an impact on the Israeli diamond industry, which is also being buffeted by domestic crises, including criminal investigations and the bankruptcies of several major dealers. Diamond exports dropped almost 20 per cent in the first half of 2012, compared to the same period last year. Net diamond exports totalled $3.26 billion (all figures US) in the first six months of the year, compared to $4.03 billion last year, the Industry, Trade and Labor Ministry reported. Of that amount, $1.52 billion was for uncut diamonds, compared to $2.26 billion for the same six-month period in 2011 – a 33 per cent drop. The United States is still the main destination for polished diamonds, with 47 per cent of exports heading to America. That's followed by Hong Kong, with 29 per cent; Belgium, 7 per cent; Switzerland, 6 per cent; and England, 2 per cent.

MSCI considering adding Israel: International stock index company MSCI is considering adding Israeli stocks to its European index, instead of leaving them in the Europe and Middle East index, where they currently are. MSCI moved Israel from its developing nation index to a developed one in 2010, but did not include Israel in its Europe index at the time. This is considered one of the reasons trading volume on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange has been so thin lately. Esther Levanon, CEO of the TASE, said the exchange would welcome the move.

Family reunion novel a 'Jewish Big Chill'

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

In The World Without You (Pantheon), Joshua Henkin's third novel, three adult sisters travel to their parents' Massachusetts summer home on the July 4 weekend for a memorial for their younger brother who died in Iraq a year earlier.

It's sort of a Jewish Big Chill.

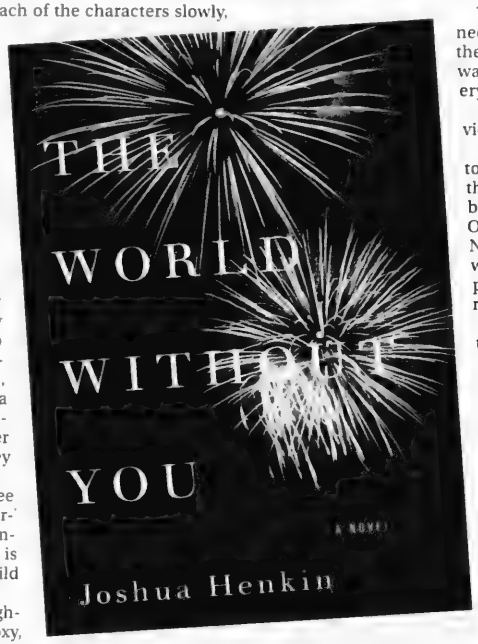
We are introduced to each of the characters slowly, in successive chapters. David and Marilyn Frankel, the parents, are having trouble coping with Leo's death. The youngest of four children, Leo was a journalist working in Iraq in 2004 when he was kidnapped and murdered.



They are a Jewish family but very secular. David's circumcision, we are told, was the first and last Jewish ritual he ever observed. Much as they are looking forward to the family's reunion despite the solemn occasion, they also plan to launch a bombshell on their children, telling them that after 40 years of marriage, they are separating.

The oldest of the three red-haired siblings is Clarissa, a professor at Columbia University who, at 39, is trying to have her first child with her husband.

Noelle, the middle daughter, converted to Orthodoxy, a surprising move for someone who was kicked out of two high schools for her promiscuity. Now living in Israel with her husband, Avram, she has four boys, Akiva, Yoni, Dov and Ari, and has great disdain for secular Israelis. She caused a stir in the family when she refused to attend Leo's marriage to a non-Jew.

Lily, the youngest sister, is a Washington lawyer who calls her four pale, blue-eyed nephews "Aryan Israelis." She holds all 50 million George Bush voters responsible for Leo's death, including Noelle, who voted from Israel.

Leo's widow, Thisbe, and their three-year-old son Calder, who looks remarkably like his father, join the family for the weekend. Thisbe also has a bombshell of her own she needs to tell the Frankels.

Much as The World Without You is about this "get-together," it's really about separation – the distance all the characters have from each other. David and Marilyn's impending separation, and Thisbe and Noelle's alienation from the family, are just some examples.

Marilyn and David go to great lengths to make the weekend kosher for Noelle, buying kosher food and dishes. But Noelle offends them by bringing her own sandwiches.

The kitchen itself would need to be kosher, she tells them. "The oven, the dishwasher, the microwave, everything."

"You're kidding me?" David says incredulously.

The daughters bring far too much baggage with them for this weekend to be anything but a disaster. One evening, Lily berates Noelle for living "in your warmongering country, practising your delusional religion."

Throughout the book, the author finds ways to bring two of the characters alone together in a sort of round-robin tournament. In one chapter, for instance, it's David and Lily sharing quiet conversation. In the next, it might be Noelle and Thisbe. In this way we learn more about the complicated relationships between the characters and some of the baggage they've been carrying.

The novel has a great premise and some of the scenes, especially the memorial they hold for Leo, are powerful and moving.

But there is just a tad too much brooding and flashback that ultimately hold this book back. While they are necessary to flesh out the people in this character-driven novel, they tend to slow the pace to a crawl at several points.

The characters get together, they fight, bicker, resolve some issues and leave, but the lack of a major plotline will give readers a sense of incompleteness. As much as the characters in the book are looking for some kind of closure, so, too, are the readers left looking for one.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

EYE ON ARTS

SHAW FESTIVAL PRESENTS RAGTIME

The musical Ragtime, based on the outstanding novel by E. L. Doctorow and produced by Garth Drabinsky's ill-fated Livent, made its world premiere at the Toronto Centre for the Arts in 1996 and went on to win multiple Tony and other awards on Broadway.

The current revival of Ragtime at the Shaw Festival in Niagara-on-the-Lake, directed by Shaw artistic director Jackie Maxwell, demonstrates once again the power of the syncopated music and lyrics to skim over a compressed narrative while still managing to power the turbines that generate emotional excitement and theatrical electricity.

The story spotlights a wealthy white family living in a New York suburb in the early years of the 20th century, whose lives intersect with the families of a poor Jewish immigrant and a black man named Coalhouse Walker Jr., who is radicalized after being victimized by racial bigots in the local fire department.

Most of the characters possess only generic labels such as "Father," "Mother," "Older Brother" and "Tateh": they seem as archetypical as china figurines, yet all are players in a well-paced dramatic narrative powered largely through music. The new syncopated ragtime of the day helped to lift America "out of sedate and square, and into vibrant," as Shaw musical director Paul Sportelli notes, adding that ragtime was the precursor to jazz.

Famous personalities of the times, including Henry Ford, Emma Goldman, Evelyn Nesbit, Harry Houdini and Booker T. Washington, float through the production like so many Banquo's ghosts, each espousing the ideas and energy that helped to give the era its flare. By story's end, the survivors of all three families meld together into a single family, emblematic of the great American melting pot.

This Shaw production rekindles the kinetic spirit if not the actual fireworks of the original. Standouts among the cast include Thom Allison (Coalhouse) and Alana Hibbert (his girlfriend Sarah), whose voices were particularly strong and resonant as accompanied by the 17-piece orchestra. The cast also features the wonderful Patty Jamieson, Jay Turvey, Kate Hennig, Benedict Campbell, Julie Martell, Evan Alexander Smith and Kelly Wong; the theatrical book is by Terrence McNally, music by Stephen Flaherty, lyrics by Lynn Ahrens. On stage until Oct. 14; for tickets, please visit www.shawfest.com

Names in the News: In tribute to Argentine Jewish writer Alicia Steimberg, who died in June, jewishfiction.net has published an excerpt from Steimberg's latest novel, Innocent Spirit, which JewishFiction editor Nora Gold had already accepted for August. Before her death, Steimberg "was delighted" to learn that her story had been accepted, Gold reports, adding: "She was also delightful. Even in the short time we corresponded, it was obvious what an unusual person she was: full of warmth and completely unpretentious."

The website (jewishfiction.net) also features a tribute to Steimberg by translator Andrea Labinger. Born in Buenos Aires in 1933, Steimberg is best known for her 1998 novel Musicians and Watchmakers, about a Jewish family in Buenos Aires in the 1940s, told from the perspective of an adolescent girl.

Dance festival puts Laurentians on the cultural map

Heather Solomon
Special to The CJN

Engineer Lou Gordon found a way to make the Laurentians a dance magnet.

The former board member of the Saidye Bronfman Centre (SBC) and Broadway theatre lover felt that his summers in the mountains had become a little flat.

"The whole cultural scene was barren. People talked about their boats and about cutting their lawn and where they were going for dinner. I met choreographer Michael Montanaro in Montreal and told him I wanted to start a dance festival," says Gordon.

"Why did I choose dance when my first love is theatre? Because there's no language barrier, and since we're in Quebec, it would be terrific to have the French and English communities come together."

He opened his festival 21 years ago, and for the first four years, the old Hiawatha summer camp served as its venue. Despite the primitive conditions there, companies such as the Royal Winnipeg Ballet filled the roster.

Gordon began scouting out sites in St. Sauveur and was offered the Cirque du Soleil's original tent.

The Festival des arts de Saint-Sauveur, or FASS as it is affectionately known, has since graduated to a state-of-the-art big top supplied by FASS board member Jack Wiseman.

Nathalie Grosshenny and Lou Gordon roll out a warm welcome at Festival des arts de Saint-Sauveur (FASS), July 26 to Aug. 4. *(Heather Solomon photo)

It is air-conditioned and boasts 600 seats on risers, all with an excellent view of the stage. Instead of bunkhouses, the dancers are treated to rooms in the best local hotels.

"You want to spoil them because they give you their gift onstage," says Gordon. "We love what they do, and they love us in return. We've had the best companies in the world from the Kirov to the Royal Ballet of Sweden."

Former principal dancer of Les Grands Ballets Canadiens, Anik Bissonnette, is the artistic director of FASS.

This year, Nathalie Grosshenny has been appointed executive director. She is a former ballerina from Mulhouse, Alsace, in France who danced here with La Compagnie Eddy Toussaint and co-founded the Gala des Étoiles dance showcase.

She's been passionate about dance since the age of eight. "I was a tomboy and my mother said, 'It's enough now. You're going to become a lady and go to dance class. From the moment I touched the boards and did my first plié, I knew it was what I wanted to do," she says.

A taste of dance at FASS has similarly made enthusiasts out of even first-time viewers. The July 26 to Aug. 4 lineup tempts with a variety of dance as well as music.

The exquisite Hong Kong Ballet, under the direction of Madeleine Onne, who was pronounced Dancer of the Swedish Royal Court by King Carl XVI Gustaf, opens the festival with sensual and dramatic pieces.

Hélène Blackburn, who studied with Linda Rabin, choreographs her internationally popular company, Cas public, to the music of J.S. Bach's Goldberg Variations.

Esmeralda Enrique brings her flamenco troupe from Toronto to burn up the stage, and Moses Pendleton of Momix turns dancers' bodies, with the aid of props, puppetry, costumes and lighting, into a riot of hothouse blooms in Botanica.

The award-winning Trey McIntyre Project salutes survivors of hurricane Katrina in one of its choreographies. Dance critic/filmmaker Philip Szporer leads all pre-performance discussions.

On the musical front, opera star Gino Quilico brings his lyric baritone to arias, love songs and Broadway tunes. And the Canadian Vocal Arts Institute under Joan Dornemann, which trains young opera singers in Israel and elsewhere, gives FASS audiences the chance to hear rising stars.

Poetic pop-rocker Lewis Furey sings a recital of selected songs, including a film score he co-wrote with Leonard Cohen.

Free shows on the outdoor stage feature Acadian music, Quebec clogging, cellists playing heavy-metal music, tango, hip hop, circus acrobatics and jazz. The Tohu Bohu Youth Festival in Parc Filion gets the younger set involved. The full slate of events is at www.fass.ca.

"For the past 12 years we've sponsored 100 seniors from Camp B'nai B'rith. One 89-year-old man fell in love with one of the dancers and didn't want to leave!" says Gordon. "For all our audiences, it's like going to a good Passover meal – you want to come back."

British musician channels Jerry Lee Lewis

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

British recording artist Martin Kaye is making his professional theatrical debut playing rock 'n' roller, Jerry Lee Lewis in the Million Dollar Quartet, running at the Toronto Centre for the Arts until July 29.

Martin Kaye

Million Dollar Quartet is based on a night in Memphis in December 1956, when four rock 'n' roll pioneers – Carl Perkins, Johnny Cash, Jerry Lee Lewis and Elvis Presley – ended up at Sam Phillips' Sun Records storefront studio, jamming. Phillips discovered all four musical icons.

"It was meant to be a Carl Perkins recording session," Kaye said in an interview. "Jerry Lee Lewis was actually there as a session piano player. Elvis Presley and Johnny Cash were both in town and dropped by, so it turned into this jam session. The tape was left on, so the session was recorded. Today it is actually available on iTunes."

Although most of the songs sung that evening were from the gospel realm reflecting the musicians' roots, Million Dollar Quartet also includes the icons' many hits, among them Blue Suede Shoes, Fever, Who Do You Love?, Great Balls of Fire, Folsom Prison Blues and Hound Dog.

Kaye, 28, admits he didn't grow up listening to this music. "My parents listened to Elton John and music from the late '60s and '70s era, rather than the '50s, and my grandparents were slightly too old and were probably the ones that disagreed with it."

Despite this, he said, he sees many similarities between himself and Jerry Lee Lewis.

"I am honoured to play Jerry Lee Lewis – he's the last one standing, the one who is still alive. I definitely relate to him when I'm on stage. We are both very wild on stage and we both have a passion for what we do, think about and dream about. Obviously, there are personal things that happened in his life that haven't happened in mine."

He feels the show gives audiences a sense of history about a time that revolutionized music and resonates with both those who lived through the '50s and remember these hits from their youth, and those who are enjoying this music for the first time.

Kaye, who recently relocated to New York, has worked as a professional musician for 10 years and spent the last four years performing on cruise ships. He's known for both his colourful piano playing and his equally colourful mismatched socks – a memorable fashion statement that sets him apart.

He is about to release the followup to his first CD, About You, called Everything The Pen Wants To Say. He has also been collaborating with L.A.-based, '70s artist and songwriter Kenny Nolan on a future album.

Kaye started singing at the age of three and playing the piano at seven. He went to a Jewish elementary school and sang in the choir. From the ages of 11 to 16, he joined a local Jewish youth theatre group that his aunt was active with. His experience on stage made him realize that this was something he really wanted to do. His parents thought he was a natural and encouraged him to follow his dreams.

He still loves the Jewish traditions, and when he gets back home to the Manchester area, he especially likes to be part of family Sabbath dinners.

Kaye will marry his American fiancée, Holly Fonda, on Sept. 2 in England.

For more information on Martin Kaye, go to www.martin-k.com. For tickets to Million Dollar Quartet, call 416-644-3665 or 1-866-950-7469 or visit www.DancapTickets.com.

Turkey's soul lies in its capital city, Ankara

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

ANKARA, Turkey — Western tourists don't normally visit Turkey's sleepy capital, Ankara, preferring to focus on such glitzy destinations as Istanbul, Izmir or Cappadocia.

Big mistake.

Ankara is well worth your time for at least two good reasons: the Museum of Anatolian Civilizations, which speaks to Turkey's historic origins as a nation, and Anitkabir, the mausoleum of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the founder and first president of the Republic of Turkey.

It's true that Ankara lacks Istanbul's sophistication, Izmir's Mediterranean flair and Cappadocia's exoticism.

But if you really want to plumb the depths of Turkey's soul, you should spend a day or two in Ankara, only a 45-minute flight from Istanbul.

The museum, housed in the shell of an old Ottoman bazaar storage building, contains the most extensive collection of Anatolian archeological artifacts in the world, from the Paleolithic era onward.

The exhibits are arranged in chronological order, and as you move from one display case to the next, you will see an impressive array of artifacts from the Neolithic, Early Bronze, Assyrian, Hittite, Greek, Roman, Byzantine, Seljuk and Ottoman periods.

There are prehistoric stone tools, wall paintings and reliefs, clay figurines, statuettes, sculptures, decorative jewelry, coins, Cuneiform tablets, pottery, furniture and weapons of war.

Apart from the museum, the citadel, the original site of Ankara, is also worth visiting. From its ramparts, panoramic vistas of Ankara and its hilly terrain come into view.

Resembling a Turkish village, the citadel is a remnant of both the Hittite empire, which encompassed Asia Minor, and the Byzantine empire, which was conquered by the Seljuks, the predecessors of the Ottomans.

Within walking distance of the citadel are arts and crafts stores, gift shops, spice and dried fruit vendors and restaurants, all bringing you back to the present.

Another must-see attraction is Anitkabir, a complex dedicated to the life and times of Ataturk (1881-1938).

Ataturk, born in Salonika, was an Ottoman and Turkish army officer who distinguished himself in battle in the Balkan wars from 1912 to 1913, in World War I and in Turkey's War of National Independence from 1919 to 1922.

With the proclamation of the Turkish republic on Oct. 29, 1923, Ataturk assumed the presidency, transforming Turkey into a modern, westernized secular state.

Ataturk abolished the caliphate and Ottoman sartorial traditions, separated governmental and religious affairs, replaced Arabic script with a Latin alphabet, granted full civic rights to minorities and women, and reorganized universities.

In foreign policy, his guiding principle was "peace in the world," a formula that prompted him to sign a treaty of friendship with Turkey's nemesis, Greece, and conclude a mutual defence agreement with neighbours Romania, Greece and Yugoslavia in the Balkan Pact.

At Anitkabir, a concrete courtyard vast in scale, you wait in a long queue to enter the mausoleum.

Passing through massive brass doors, you reach a huge hall whose red marble walls are inscribed with mosaics of Hittite, Hellenic, Roman, Seljuk and Ottoman civilizations. Ataturk's tomb lies beneath a cenotaph.

On the eastern side of the courtyard, inside a museum, some of Ataturk's personal effects, namely his black Cadillac and Lincoln sedans and his houseboat, are displayed.

The gun carriage that carried his remains at his funeral is also exhibited.

Most Turks revere Ataturk, and the veneration that is bestowed on him harkens back to Stalin's Russia, Abdul Gamal Nasser's Egypt and Kim Jong-il's North Korea.

A Canadian visitor may look askance at this cult of the personality. But the adoration in which Ataturk is held seems genuine. Ataturk was a modernizer and a democrat who reformed Turkey, and this achievement is respectfully recognized by many Turks.

Anitkabir reflects their deep-seated feelings.

Italian soccer star raised by Jewish parents

Compiled by CJN Staff

Italian soccer star Mario Balotelli, who scored twice against Germany to lead the Azzuri into the final against Spain, grew up as the foster son of a Jewish mother in the village of Concesio, east of Milan.

Balotelli, 21, dedicated the two goals he scored in Italy's 2-1 semifinals victory over Germany on June 28 to his foster mother, Silvia, who raised him from the age of three. Newspapers and websites ran a dramatic photo of Balotelli tearfully embracing her after the match.

An article on Moked, the website of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, called the embrace "an emotion for all Italians and a special emotion for Italian Jews."

Balotelli revealed the fact that his adoptive mother was Jewish in early June, when, like other teams, the Italian national squad visited Auschwitz ahead of the start of the games.

Radio Netherlands reported that during the visit, Balotelli sat down, all by himself, on the train tracks and stared silently ahead. "A while later," the report said, "he tells his teammates about a box of letters that his Jewish adoptive mother kept underneath her bed. He had never told anyone."

The white supremacist website Stormfront attacked Balotelli, who is black, with vicious racist and antisemitic insults.

"He's black and Jewish he should play for Israel not Italy," wrote one person.

Balotelli was born Mario Barwuah to Ghanaian immigrant parents in Palermo, Italy. He suffered from health problems as a small child and eventually his financially strapped parents placed him in the care of Francesco and Silvia Balotelli.

A writer in the Italian Jewish monthly Pagine Ebraiche called Balotelli "the symbol of the commitment that brings together the experience of immigration, of acceptance and of success. But [he is] also a tribute to his adoptive mother, the Italian Jew who welcomed the child and whose family suffered during the dark years of the Shoah."

According to Ynet, the Balotellis have relatives in Israel and their daughter studied at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya.

When he became successful as a soccer player, his biological parents sought to reenter his life, but Balotelli rejected them as "glory hunters," the Times of Israel reported.

Despite his health issues, at age 15 Balotelli became the youngest player ever to play in Italy's third division. He later played for Inter Milan before moving to England to play for Manchester City, where he won the Premier League title this past season.

A volatile personality who has been redcarded four times in the Premier League to go along with 21 yellow cards, he reportedly was also wearing out his welcome with the Italian side.

Some reports suggest that the abuse he faces because of his background prompt some of the behavior. Radio Netherlands reported that, "Irish fans during the Euro 2012 match made monkey noises when he entered the pitch."

Nevertheless, Balotelli came up big in the game against Germany, and later he described the win as "the most wonderful night of my life so far."

According to The Times of Israel, he dedicated the goals to his mother, who had come from Italy to watch him play.

"At the end of the game when I went to my mother, that was the best moment. I told her these goals were for her. I waited a long time for this moment, especially as my mother is not young anymore and can't travel far, so I had to make her happy when she came all the way here."

Pressel's par not good enough at LPGA event

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

WATERLOO, Ont. — Shooting even par would be quite the accomplishment for most golfers, but not for a pro.

Morgan Pressel flirted with par over four rounds at the Manulife LPGA Classic at the Grey Silo Golf Club, shooting rounds of 70, 71, 72 and 71, good for even par but only 59th place overall.

Pressel, a native of Boca Raton, Fla., finished 16 strokes behind tournament winner Brittany Lang, who won the event in a playoff. Pressel took home $3,189 for her efforts.

Along with Anna Nordqvist and Na Yeon Choi, Pressel had her share of spectators follow her during the second round at the Grey Silo course, including this reporter.

They weren't disappointed if what they were looking for is length and accuracy off the tee. In nine holes that I watched, none missed the fairway.

Morgan Pressel

With wide and flat fairways, this was a second shot course, and in round two, that's where Pressel's game seemed to lag. Pressel is ranked 90th on the LPGA tour for greens in regulation, with 62.4 per cent, but in the back nine, she failed to hit a single one, despite good lies.

Nevertheless, all three showed good ability to get up and down, with Pressel's chipping a major asset.

What the ladies were lacking, at least on day two, was the ability to make a putt. There were lots of oohs and aahhs after near misses, but you didn't see the consistency that gets you into the winner's circle.

Pressel's stats are actually not bad; she's 45th on tour in "putts per green in regulation," with 1.83.

She's also 41st in scoring with an average round of 72.35.

So far this season, she's earned $249,573 (all figures US) but she's finished in the top 10 only once. Since she joined the tour in 2006, she's won two events and taken home $4.64 million.

U of T part of major Israeli archeological find

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

University of Toronto archeologists are part of a team that unearthed a stunning mosaic floor that decorated the interior of a synagogue that stood in Israel around the fourth to sixth centuries CE.

Since June 2011, U of T's archeology centre, led by Michael Chazan, has been participating in the Huqoq Excavation Project, which is directed by Jodi Magness, the religious studies professor at the University of North Carolina, and David Amit, an archeologist with the Israel Antiquities Authority.

The goal of the project, expected to continue for the next five years, is to excavate the late Roman and Byzantine site of Huqoq in Israel near the Sea of Galilee to uncover the remains of a synagogue and understand its setting in the village.

Huqoq, which was abandoned in the Middle Ages and was later re-inhabited by Arabs until the State of Israel was established in 1948, lies about five kilometres west of Capernaum, which is where Jesus is believed to have lived as an adult, and about five kilometres north of Migdal, the birthplace of Mary Magdalene.

Alex Gropper, president of U of T's Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies (CIMS) who has led past archeological digs to Israel, said this discovery is exciting because not only did the archeologists find the synagogue they were looking for, but also a beautiful mosaic floor with an inscription on it.

According to a press release on U of T's website, the mosaic is made from high quality coloured stone cubes and includes a scene depicting Samson placing torches between the tails of foxes.

Another part of the mosaic features two female faces that flank a Hebrew inscription that refers to rewards for those who perform good deeds.

"This discovery is significant because only a small number of ancient synagogue buildings are decorated with mosaics showing biblical scenes, and only two others have scenes with Samson – one is at another site just a couple of miles from Huqoq," Magness was quoted in the U of T press release.

Although Gropper, who said the discovery of the mosaic was a "complete surprise," added that based on the photos he's seen, he hasn't been able to translate the inscription, which is either in Hebrew or Aramaic. He said he looks forward to learning exactly what the inscription says.

But what the elaborate mosaic reveals is that the village where the synagogue stood was likely very prosperous, Gropper said.

"It also indicates that there was a very strong Jewish presence in the land despite the fact that it had supposedly been depopulating because of the revolts against Rome… This just buttresses and highlights the Jewish presence in the area."

He said he hasn't yet been able to visit the site since they began digging in June 2011, but said he's looking forward to hearing from Magness, who was invited by the CIMS to speak on Nov. 1 at U of T.

The Huqoq Excavation Project is supported in part by U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies, the Archeology Centre, as well as the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies, which is accepting donations to continue to fund the dig.

Presbyterians narrowly reject divestment

JTA

WASHINGTON — In a narrow vote, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (USA) rejected divestment from companies doing business with Israeli security forces in the West Bank.

The 333-331 vote, with two abstentions, in Pittsburgh on July 5, was the closest that the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement has come to a win in a major arena.

The vote replaced a measure recommending investment for peace among Palestinians instead of the majority report of a Middle East committee, which had recommended divestment from Caterpillar, Motorola Solutions and Hewlett Packard for supplying settlements and the Israeli army with security products for use in the West Bank.

A similar measure was defeated more decisively at a Methodist assembly in May, and last month MSCI-ESG, an influential adviser on investment for progressive causes, said that Caterpillar's supply of bulldozers to Israel was a factor – although not the decisive one – in the decision to remove the company from recommended investments.

The Jewish community had been particularly active in lobbying against the Presbyterian measure.

Earlier this week, the dovish American Jewish groups, Americans for Peace Now and J Street, also called on the Presbyterian Church's plenary to vote down the resolution.

Also, Ethan Felson, vice-president of the Jewish Council of Public Affairs and the umbrella agency's point person on interfaith relations, was at the convention to speak with church leaders about toning down the resolution, according to a JCPA spokesperson.

In the lead up to the vote, more than 12,000 Jews had signed a letter urging delegates to the Presbyterian General Assembly to reject the resolution. The "Letter of Hope," which followed an earlier letter signed by 1,300 rabbis sent to the PCUSA, called on Presbyterians to deepen their "understandings of the multiple narratives in the region" and "focus on positive steps including economic development, Palestinian state building, and a return to negotiations."

However, Rabbi Alissa Wise, Jewish Voice for Peace's director of campaigns, was also in Pittsburgh for the convention and lobbied on behalf of the resolution.

"It's too early to know what is going to happen, but I have been moved to tears on multiple occasions as I saw authentic recognition of Palestinian experience and deep commitment to justice for all people by the Presbyterian Church," she said after the vote. "This is a historic moment in the struggle for dignity and justice, and I commend the PCUSA for getting us this close to holding corporations accountable for profiting from the occupation."

CONTROVERSIAL MAGAZINE SPREAD INSPIRES PHOTOGRAPHER

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Israel's BelleMode magazine's decision to publish controversial photos depicting Orthodox Jews in provocative poses on buses earlier this year inspired a Toronto-based photographer to run a workshop examining the role of women in Israeli society.

Liat Aharoni, a 22-year-old fifth-year political science student at the University of Toronto who calls herself a "self-taught fine arts photographer," said she's excited about leading a workshop on July 22 that will combine both the technical and the analytic aspects of photography.

She said the goal of the event is to hone participants' photography and editing skills while examining the tensions that bubbled to the surface when women began protesting being pressured by the Orthodox community in the Jerusalem suburb of Beit Shemesh to sit at the back of public buses.

Aharoni, Hillel of Greater Toronto's event co-ordinator – a role she is serving as part of the Kohn Internship program, a 10-week Jewish Vocational Services initiative that places students at Jewish non-profit agencies each summer – applauded BelleMode for publishing the photos, which ran a few weeks after women's rights protests in some of Israel's most religious Jewish communities.

For years, Israeli women have been pressured to move to the back of public buses that serve primarily haredi Jews.

This practice is seen as a prime example of the growing tensions between the secular and Orthodox communities, but tensions peaked late last year when an eight-year-old girl was spat on by haredi men in Beit Shemesh because they felt she was dressed immodestly.

This sparked demonstrations against the segregation of women, and weeks later, the Israeli magazine ran photos that Aharoni felt were published in support of women's rights in Israel.

"From what I gathered from other people, a lot of people were offended by [the photos], but for me, I think they represent something so powerful," Aharoni said.

"These models who were dressed as Orthodox chassidic men, they were also being very provocative, and to me, that symbolized that regardless of your faith, you're still a sexual being at the end of the day," she continued.

Liat Aharoni

Aharoni said that although she only delved into photography "in a meaningful way" a few months ago, she has always been inspired by the art.

"It's a recent thing for me that I've taken this very seriously, but I've had a lot of positive feedback about my work so far in such a short time, so it's been very encouraging," she said.

On top of her internship with Hillel and her two jobs, Aharoni said she still makes an effort to find time to hone her photography skills.

"I try to come out as much as possible – for me that means giving up on a lot of my social life and working into the wee hours of the night because it's something I'm so passionate about."

And Aharoni hopes her passion for the art will inspire others later this month when students meet for the workshop, which will be held between 12 p.m. and 4 p.m. at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

She wants the event to push students to think critically about issues where women are demeaned and marginalized, but also explore how women are celebrated in Jewish and Israeli cultures.

"I don't know what knowledge each participant will be coming with, what understanding they already have, so it'll be an opportunity to learn about Judaism and women, and also hopefully to inspire their own opinions during the several hours that we'll be together," she said.

Following a lecture and discussion, the students will work with three experienced photographers, including Aharoni, to learn how to edit photos on software such as Photoshop.

The participants will have two hours to take photos in Toronto's Kensington Market, and each will have time to work with a model.

The lead photographers will also take the participants through the process of editing a photo step-by-step.

"They don't have to come with the best camera and they don't have to have a lot of knowledge about it, but if it's something they're interested in, it can be a really interesting experience for anybody."

For more information, or to sign up, email Aharoni at liat.aharoni@hilleltoronto.org.

"תראי איזה בובון התינוק הזה." טלי מנידה ראש לעבר תינוק זהוב פלומה, שמחייך אליה בפיו חסר השיניים. "בעלי, מאתמול, לוחץ על בן קטן." היא אומרת. "לבעלך יש טריק סודי לעשיית בנים קטנים?" אני מבררת קצת מעוצבנת. "ומה אם תיוולד לכם בת? הוא ישאיר אותה על הר גבוה ונטוש?"

PINEAPPLE & COCONUT RICE

2 c Jasmine rice
1 1/4 c soup broth
1 c coconut milk
1 c cubed or crushed pineapple
2 tbls soy sauce (plus more for drizzling)
1 tblsp sesame oil
1 tsp brown sugar
1/4 c finely chopped scallions
Optional toppings:
Macadamia Nuts, Almonds, Toasted Coconut Flakes

Rinse rice several times until water runs clear. Drain. Make rice in a) Rice Cooker: combine rice, broth and coconut milk and cook. Or b) Stove Top: place rice, broth and coconut milk in pot; bring to a boil. Once boiling, turn heat to low; cover with tight fitting lid; let cook 20 mins. Turn off heat and without opening lid, let it sit for another 10 min to finish steaming.

After rice has cooked: Fluff with a fork; mix in pineapple, soy sauce, brown sugar, sesame oil. Top with chopped scallions and any other recommended toppings. Drizzle a touch more soy sauce if desired.

Bill C-31: I crawled into bed

When Bill C-31 was passed by the Senate, I fell into a deep sadness. I did because I couldn't understand how men and women elected to lead our country could unanimously decide to deny a place of refuge, and vital medicine, to men, women and children longing for the safety and security we cherish.

Bill C-31 implicitly determines that if a Jew persecuted in Hungary, as is happening today, or a Roma who has been attacked and is the victim of what Amnesty International calls (regarding Hungary) "violent and hate crimes" (see this report: http://www.amnesty.ca/amnestynews/upload/EUR270012010.pdf), it will still be nearly impossible for them to stay in Canada. Furthermore, when they're denied refugee status, they won't be able to appeal the verdict and will be sent back to the place they fled within 45 days, a place where right-wing thugs are openly calling them vermin and bugs.

I fell into bed on the night of June 27, the night the Senate passed Bill C-31, struggling with the reality that every single Conservative party member (except a few who didn't vote) voted "yes." I'm confused about how our government remained deaf to the pleas and protestations by the Canadian medical community – including the Canadian Medical Association, the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, and the Canadian Pediatric Society – as well as churches, the Toronto Board of Rabbis, refugee lawyers, experts on the refugee issue and Canadian citizens en masse. Our governing bodies heard speeches by respected doctors such as Dr. Philip Berger on the effects that changes to the Interim Federal Health Program will have on children and pregnant women – the risk of severe illness and death.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Please note that as of July 1, all refugees no longer have access to medication through the Interim Federal Health Program, including lifesaving medications such as insulin. Please be clear that individuals from "designated countries," including Jews from Hungary, will not have access to emergency care. This includes children, pregnant women and people facing acute crises, such as heart attacks.

Hear the words of Senator Jane Cordy, who stated in her speech prior to the passing of the bill in the Senate: "What is written in law can often be far different than what is happening on the ground in many so-called 'safe countries.' Indeed, it is when a country is deemed safe that those facing persecution often face the greatest challenges. Fellow Canadians, there is a rise of antisemitism in Hungary. Please read articles on June 5 in The Canadian Jewish News stating this very clearly... Judaism teaches the concept of tikkun olam, an exhortation to repair the world. If passed, Bill C-31 would be antithetical to these values. Ironically, we also understand that, were our families to arrive today under the federal government's new rules, they would be denied health care and, ultimately, citizenship. Returning to the retrograde policies that inspired 'none is too many' must be rejected."

We have three years to go before the next federal election. I strongly suggest that we stand very much on guard over what happens to those refugees who are denied medical care. If one should die, we must hold our government accountable. And let's also begin questioning the logic and morality behind the concept of a majority government, particularly one in which every single member of that government must vote the party line.

We were once refugees. Thank God we made it in.

BBC Olympics website fudges Israel's capital

JTA

JERUSALEM — The BBC has amended the information about the capitals of Israel and Palestine on its Olympics web page following complaints from Israel.

Under the Israel entry, the British public broadcast system amended the site to say that the country's "seat of government [is] Jerusalem, though most foreign embassies are in Tel Aviv." It amended the Palestine entry to say that its "intended seat of government [is] East Jerusalem. Ramallah serves as administrative capital."

'We will not accept those who deny our history'

The website at first had listed "East Jerusalem" as the capital of Palestine and listed no capital for Israel – the only country with no capital listed.

After complaints from the public and a letter from Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's spokesperson Mark Regev, the BBC amended its site late last week.

"Jerusalem is the capital of the State of Israel, and accordingly we respectfully request the immediate rectification of this matter," Regev wrote.

"We will not accept those who deny our history, our sovereignty and our right to determine our own capital. Irrespective of the BBC's political agenda, Jerusalem was, is, and will always be the capital of Israel and the spiritual, political and physical centre of the Jewish People," Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat said in a statement.

Palestine has been recognized as a member of the Olympic Council of Asia since 1986 and of the International Olympic Committee since 1995.

Dr. Seuss and the Holocaust in France

Rafael Medoff
JNS.org

WASHINGTON — Annie Kriegel, 15, was sitting in her Paris high school classroom taking an exam when her mother burst into the room and warned her not to come home – the Nazis were preparing to round up and deport any Jews they could get to.

More than 3,000 miles away, Theodor Geisel, better known as Dr. Seuss, was setting pen to paper to alert Americans about what was happening to the Jews in France.

Annie found a place to stay that night. The next morning, she later recalled, she was making her way to the city's Jewish quarter and "at the crossing of the rue de Turenne and the rue de Bretagne, I heard screams rising to the heavens. [They were] not cries and squawks such as you hear in noisy and excited crowds, but screams like you used to hear in hospital delivery rooms. All the human pain that both life and death provide. A garage there was serving as a local assembly point, and they were separating the men and women."

Stunned, the teenager sat down on a nearby park bench. "It was on that bench that I left my childhood." (Kriegel's experience is recounted in Susan Zucotti's 1993 book, The Holocaust, the French and the Jews.)

CANADA

Another Jewish OC

OTTAWA — William (Grit) Laskin was one of four Jews named recently to the Order of Canada. Laskin received the honour for his contributions to arts and music. A guitar maker since 1971, his steel-string, classical and flamenco guitars are played around the world. He is a past recipient of The Saidye Bronfman Award for Excellence and is known for customized instrument decoration.

New Charges

MONTREAL — Police have accused Omar Bulphred, convicted of firebombing an Outremont chassidic school and planning to bomb the Snowdon YM-YWHA, of breaching the terms of his release. Police allege Bulphred violated his release conditions peace bond, loitered and uttered threats, but the new charges appear unrelated to his previous crimes. The new allegations come less than a month after his release from prison on June 11 after serving 40 months for the 2006 firebombing. He was ordered to undergo 30 days of psychiatric testing. Bulphred, 27, has reportedly been unrepentant over his crimes against the Jewish community and previously declared his support for jihad.

Canada in Sights

PARIS — An Islamic terrorist killed in a shootout with French police claimed Al Qaeda operatives tried to recruit him to attack Canada and the United States. French TV station TF1 aired a recording of a conversation between Mohamed Merah and police during a 32-hour standoff prior to his death. "They offered me attacks in America, Canada," he said. Merah killed three Jewish schoolchildren, a rabbi and three paratroopers in Toulouse last March.

Gift to Birthright

NEW YORK — Billionaire casino magnate Sheldon Adelson and his Israeli-born wife, Dr. Miriam Adelson, have pledged $13 million (US) to Taglit-Birthright Israel in recognition of its bar mitzvah year. The money is earmarked to reduce Birthright's 20,000-person waiting list. It comes on top of a $20-million challenge grant made by the Adelsons earlier this year. Altogether, the Adelsons have given more than $140 million U.S. to Birthright.

Nazi Collaborator

BUDAPEST — Hungarian police have charged Ladislaus Csizsik-Csatary, a former Nazi collaborator, with the war crimes of personally torturing Jews. Csizsik-Csatary, 97, lived in Canada until 1997. He left the country rather than face deportation proceedings after losing his citizenship over his war crimes. He "played a key role in the deportation of over 15,000 Jews to Auschwitz in the spring of 1944," said Nazi hunter Efraim Zuroff, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Israel office. Zuroff alerted authorities to Csizsik-Csatary's presence in Hungary.

Obama calls for Moment of Silence

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Barack Obama has joined the campaign for a moment of silence at the London Olympics to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the massacre of 11 Israeli Olympians at the 1972 Olympics.

"We absolutely support the campaign for a minute of silence at the Olympics to honour the Israeli athletes killed in Munich," National Security Council spokesman Tommy Vietor told Yahoo News in an email.

The families of the victims of the 1972 massacre have mounted a global campaign to get the International Olympic Committee (IOC) to hold an official moment of silence at the Games – something IOC officials already have rejected for this year and have never done in the past. However, IOC representatives have attended Israeli and Jewish-organized commemorations.

Aside from Obama, the U.S. Senate, the German Bundestag, the Canadian and Australian parliaments, about 50 members of the British Parliament, the Israeli government, Jewish organizations worldwide and about 100 members of Australia's Parliament have urged the IOC to hold a moment of silence. Australian Prime Minister Julia Gillard recently sent a personal letter to IOC President Jacques Rogge calling for a moment of silence.

Binstock has medal hopes at London Olympics

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Josh Binstock has been a volleyball prodigy since he was about 16 years old. Long considered one of the best beach prospects in Canada, the 31-year-old native of Richmond Hill, Ont., is in London this week, fulfilling his dream to compete in the Olympic Games.

Binstock and Martin Reader were selected to represent Canada following a competition earlier this month at Ashbridge's Bay in Toronto.

They were joined in London by the women's team of Marie-Andrée Lessard and Annie Martin.

"It's been a long, hard road for these two teams," commented Hugh Wong, president of Volleyball Canada, "travelling all over the globe and playing against the best teams in the world. They clearly demonstrated that they belong in the 2012 Olympic beach volleyball tournament by dominating their competition at the Continental Qualifier last month in Mexico, and by their wins [at Ashbridge's Bay]. We know that they will represent us well at the Olympic Games."

"Right now, I couldn't be more excited," Binstock said. "I played hockey originally, and used to play with lots of emotion. Today, I brought that emotion with me on the beach volleyball court and it helped me."

Heading into the Games, Binstock and Reader were ranked 34th in the world. At their last pre-Olympic tournament in Klagenfurt, Austria, they finished 41st – the same position as at an event in Rome a month before.

CUSTOM MONUMENTS

The time had come for my wife's unveiling. My kids and I wanted a monument that honoured her memory and captured who she was. A stone of lasting beauty, so that when we visited her grave, we felt close to her. The monument counsellor at Benjamin's Landmark designed a custom stone at a price we could afford. They truly took the utmost care.

"They thought of everything."

The IOC's shame

From the editor's desk...

Is there a people whose emotions rise and fall, stir then settle, with the tugging of the calendar more than the Jewish People? Probably not.

The annual calendar is the recurring canvas of time on which our collective memory each year paints the latest image of our peoplehood.

The Torah sanctifies five distinct holy periods of the calendar: Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and the three pilgrimage holidays. The ancient rabbis sanctified two additional "lesser" holidays: Chanukah and Purim. They also designated six periods of fasting in addition to the fast of Yom Kippur.

The sense of peoplehood that our acute affinity to the calendar has created and recreated over the many millennia also ensures that our collective memory is permanently engaged.

Thus, we recalled last week on July 18, with as much anger as sorrow, the 18th anniversary of the murder of 85 people at the Jewish Community Centre (AMIA) in Buenos Aires. Hundreds more were wounded. Two years earlier in the same city, on March 17, a car bomb destroyed Israel's embassy, killing 29 people and injuring 242. In both terror instances, Iran was suspected. Indeed to this day, there are still six outstanding warrants of arrest at Interpol for Iranians assumed to have been involved in the AMIA atrocity.

The commencement of the Summer Olympics in London later this week compels us to recall the slaughter of 11 Israelis at the summer Olympics 40 years ago in Munich.

By now it is widely known that the International Olympic Committee (IOC) will not set aside any time – neither one second nor one minute – at the opening ceremonies to recall the lives of the Israeli Olympians killed in Munich.

IOC president Jacques Rogge on the weekend repeated his refusal to do so, saying that the opening ceremony was not an appropriate occasion for honouring the slain Israelis.

But many people disagree with Rogge.

The Canadian Parliament was one of the first western bodies to urge the IOC to include a moment of silence at the opening ceremonies of the London Olympics.

Last week, U.S. President Barack Obama also added his voice to the call for a moment of silence. In addition to Canada and the United States, the German Bundestag, the Australian Parliament and about 50 members of the British Parliament have also formally requested the IOC to hold such a moment of silence at the start of the games.

Even renowned American sportscaster Bob Costas joined the debate. "I intend to note that the IOC denied the request," Costas told the Hollywood Reporter. "Many people find that denial more than puzzling but insensitive."

In the past, IOC representatives have attended Israeli or other commemorations of the 1972 Munich massacre. But they have steadfastly refused every request from the families of the Israeli victims and from western government officials to hold a 40-year commemoration at the opening of the London games.

Rogge will indeed lead an IOC delegation to Germany on Sept. 5, to attend a memorial ceremony at Munich's Furstenfeldbruck airbase, the actual date and place where the Palestinian terrorists massacred nine of the 11 murdered Israelis. It has also been reported that Rogge plans to hold a reception of some sort for the slain Israelis on Aug. 6. But he refuses to set aside a moment of silence at the opening ceremonies.

His refusal is utterly unconscionable.

Moreover, his assertion that a moment of silence would politicize the ceremonies is a sham. As recently as two years ago, during the winter games in Vancouver, the IOC set aside a moment of silence to memorialize the Georgian athlete who died in a training accident.

American historian Deborah Lipstadt is blunt in her assessment of the IOC's refusal. She attributes it, simply, to antisemitism.

"The IOC's explanation is nothing more than a pathetic excuse. The athletes who were murdered were from Israel and were Jews – that is why they aren't being remembered.

"Imagine for a moment that these athletes had been from the United States, Canada, Australia or even Germany. No one would think twice about commemorating them. But these athletes came from a country and a people who somehow deserve to be victims. Their lost lives are apparently not worth a minute."

Last Sunday, a modest memorial service attended by the mayor of London was held in the atrium of a London apartment block. Prayers were read, wreaths were laid, a memorial plaque was unveiled. This small group of concerned and caring individuals remembered.

We will remember, too. And we will set aside more than the mere moment of silence that the IOC refuses, to recall and hallow the memories of the 11 Israelis slain 40 years ago at the Olympics. The calendar calls. But so does our conscience. – MBD

Academy Award-Winning Actor, Friend of Israel, Coming to Toronto

Jon Voight the Featured Speaker at UJA's Campaign 2013 Launch

By Daniel Horowitz

Oscar-winning actor Jon Voight learned about anti-Semitism and intolerance at an early age, and even though he was only eight, he didn't like what he learned about the dark side of humanity.

The non-Jewish actor, best known for his roles in such iconic films as Deliverance, Midnight Cowboy and Coming Home, for which he won the Best Actor Academy Award, and the father of actress Angelina Jolie, is proud to call himself a friend of Israel and of the Jewish people.

"My father, Elmer Voight, was the golf pro at Sunnydale, a German-Jewish Country Club in Scarsdale, New York," Voight told me during a telephone interview from Los Angeles. "Because of that connection to the members of the club when I was very, very young, I learned, first-hand, about anti-Semitism. These wonderful people were not allowed to join other country clubs at the time, so they gathered together and built their own club. I learned a lot of strong lessons from Dad and I learned about the insanity of anti-Semitism.

Growing up, many of my best friends were Jews, probably because I saw how wonderfully these people treated my father, and how deeply he was affected by them. I remember thinking to myself, 'how can so many not like these people, just because they're Jewish.' Ironically, when my dad was also just eight-years-old, he caddied at the same country club. He was a very lovable little kid; the members fell in love with him. Some became his surrogate uncles and aunts, and even raised and groomed him to become a golf professional which he did at just 18."

Voight, who created a new generation of fans thanks to television roles on hit series including Seinfeld and a recurring role on 24 where he played Jack Bauer's (Kiefer Sutherland) uber-nemesis Jonas Hodges, will be the featured speaker at the community launch of United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto's Campaign 2013 – chaired by Sarena Koschitzky and Bruce Leboff. "Israel has a deep meaning for the world, and I believe it is setting a standard for the world," says Voight. "The Jewish people down through the centuries have given us so much. I've been enamoured of the great legacy of all the great people from the time of Moses down to the present. There is so much the Jewish people have contributed – and continue to contribute - to world information and knowledge, the sciences, medicine and the arts as well. I've fallen in love with that legacy. Then, of course, there is that land that has been the basis – the landscape of all of that history is, of course, Israel. It's very important to the history of the Jewish people. The Balfour agreement was the basis to provide the Jewish people with some sort of haven where they can be safe, and where there would be no attacks. I believe that is what the Balfour Declaration states, that the Jewish people have a homeland."

(from top, clockwise) Voight in the terrifying Deliverance, Voight in Coming Home, for which he won the Academy Award for Best Actor; Voight in Midnight Cowboy; Voight in his role on television's 24.

Voight, who has been to Israel on a number of occasions, spoke about an emotional visit he recently made to the city of Sderot, one of the areas on Israel's periphery, which receives funding derived from UJA's Annual Campaign. "Sderot has been attacked by thousands of rockets over the years, and it is part of their daily lives that they will be attacked," says Voight. "Nobody in America or Canada would ever stand for even one rocket landing in their towns; indiscriminate bombings every day on their children. The remarkable and beautiful people of Sderot refuse to leave simply because it's their home. They refuse to give into the terror. The people of Sderot have a system, whereby you have literally seconds to get to a bomb shelter, which they have all over the town so that they can safely get out of the way of these rockets. And many of the children of Sderot are growing up with post traumatic stress disorder. It's an appalling, tragic situation, yet, on the other hand it's very deeply moving to see the bravery of the residents of this little town. Despite their bravery, you see the weight that they are carrying, etched on their faces. Sderot is a metaphor for all of Israel, and the world doesn't rise up to protect it. It's a gross injustice."

UJA's Campaign Launch will take place on Tuesday, August 21 at 7:30 p.m. at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York hotel (100 Front Street W.)

The event will also include a musical performance by Hagit Yasso, winner of Kochav Nolad, Israel's version of the popular TV show, American Idol.

Tickets to UJA's Campaign Launch are $45 and can be purchased online at www.ujaevents.com/registration/voight as well as by email at: srotman@ujafed.org, or by telephone at: 416.631.5705

Tribute to an outgoing consul general

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Israeli consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, Amir Gissin, arguably did more than his predecessors to promote Israel and stave off anti-Israel sentiment in North America during his time here.

Next week, the affable diplomat-warrior returns to Israel with his family after five years of service in Toronto.

Since his arrival in 2008, Gissin's list of accomplishments include leading a major rebranding campaign of Israel that touted the positive impact the Jewish state has had on the world via technology, medicine and cultural exports.

He made it a priority to ensure the many disparate Jewish communities in and around Toronto – those of London, Hamilton, Kingston and Kitchener-Waterloo, among others – were always included in the discussion on ways to promote Israel and combat anti-Zionism.

He championed intra-cultural dialogue between the Jewish community and almost every other ethnic community in the Toronto area.

And for a man who is self-admittedly uneasy making public speeches, Gissin delivered more than 1,000 addresses to the community and other events during his term, all of them unscripted. It's one of the functions of his role he really won't miss, he admitted.

More than that, the 49-year-old career diplomat developed a much-deserved reputation as someone who was approachable, thoughtful, and unwavering in his passion for his country as he was averse to the trappings of his position.

Pretentiousness was anathema to him.

In short, he was the best of Israeli diplomacy personified.

On the eve of his and his family's return to Israel, Gissin sat down to speak with The CJN one final time at the consulate.

Asked how he felt about his accomplishments in Canada and his imminent return home – Gissin is a sixth generation Israeli – he said he was "overwhelmed."

"My years in Toronto have become an experience much bigger than I ever imagined, in all aspects of my life," he said. "Professionally, I feel I've achieved much more than I anticipated. [Toronto] was a very good match for me. The culture. The Jewish community. Business partners… I was privileged to be in a place where I could implement my ideas. And more importantly, that those ideas worked and succeeded."

On the personal side, Gissin said the initial relocation process to Canada for his family was difficult. "But the last few years were wonderful," he said.

He said he and his wife eventually managed to find the balance between the demands of his job and the time necessary to raise their children in a foreign land, despite all the security requirements that are endemic an Israeli diplomat's life.

"Toronto provided us with great experiences, which we will take back with us," Gissin said.

Though he'll miss the community and the friends he made in Canada, Gissin is looking forward to returning to Israel to finally set down permanent roots and dedicate more time to his wife and family.

However, the return to Israel, while greatly anticipated, is also fraught with many obstacles, he said.

Having spent nearly half of his adult life away from his homeland on different postings across the world, reintegrating back into Israeli society is likely to prove a difficult transition this time, Gissin said.

That's because he will be leaving the diplomatic corps to follow an as yet undetermined new career. In essence, he's returning to Israel without the safety net of a government job.

"Reintegrating into society won't be easy for me, my wife or my kids. But beyond the initial process, at least we know we'll be home. We've missed our family and friends. And I will never feel at home in any place other than Israel," he said.

While it won't be easy to start a new life and new career in Israel, especially at this stage of life, Gissin said this is something he really wants to do.

"I'm energized by the thought" of starting fresh, he said.

The upcoming change in career and status is already having a profound effect on him, he said.

Relinquishing the weighty role of "symbol of Israel" to Canadians and Canada's Jewish community means shedding an identity that he has lived with every minute of his life while he was the consul general.

"It will be quite a relief to return to being just myself. Because most people who view the consul general as the symbol and role model of Israel are unaware of all the limitations and challenges that an Israeli representative has."

Amir Gissin

He said the time is right for him to let go the trappings of the diplomatic life.

The constant need for formalities and the personal distancing necessary for the role were "never things that spoke to me. I'm informal by nature, a people person," Gissin said.

Outside of his job, one of Gissin's greatest passions is his love of music. A guitar player, percussionist and singer, he said one of the first things he plans to do upon his return to Israel is to get together with friends and jam.

Music, he said, is one of the things that defines him, and it was often hard to tap into that expressive outlet while he was consul general.

"I don't think I'll be making a living doing sing-alongs," he joked. "But I will bring music back to my life, big time."

Referring back to his time in Toronto, he said he feels deeply privileged to have had the opportunity to be an Israeli consul general in Canada at a time when both countries have such strong ties of friendship, both governmental and communally.

"It's a golden age" of bilateral relations, he said. "I'm glad I had a chance to contribute to it. My main goal was changing the way people perceived Israel and it happened on many levels, in many places and with many people. And it's still happening."

While not quantifiable, Gissin said that looking back at the relationship Canada and Israel had five years ago, and the perceptions Canadians had about the Jewish state and compared them to today's relationship, a sea change has occurred.

As for regrets, he said he wished it hadn't taken him quite as long to understand that the Toronto Jewish community and local Israeli representatives suffered from a dearth of grassroots relationships with other ethnic communities in the city.

"It took me two years to figure that out," he said. "It's something that increased our isolation and irrelevance [to others]. Once I realized it, I worked very hard to bring change by building bridges personally and professionally with other communities and by trying to encourage my partners in the Jewish community to do the same."

Though there's been some progress in this area over the last three years of his term, it's disappointing that there hasn't been more concerted effort by the Jewish community to reach out to other cultures in the city, he said.

He said he hopes the issue remains on the community's radar, though he realizes that issues such as Jewish education, providing services for those in need in the community and enhancing the Diaspora's understanding of Israel are all pressing items that must be prioritized over and above all else.

Next week, incoming consul general D.J. Schneeweiss will succeed Gissin, who will help transition his replacement before his departure. The two are friends.

Gissin said Toronto and Western Canada can expect a terrific new consul general.

Over the course of the last month, numerous community organizations and individuals have feted Gissin as part of a long, celebratory send-off for a job well done.

The CJN wishes to thank him as well, and we wish him and his family good luck and good health on the next part of their life's journey.

Marky's Deli closes after 43 years

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Marky's Deli & Restaurant, a glatt kosher restaurant located at Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue in the heart of Toronto's Jewish community, closed July 18 after 43 years in business.

Erez Karp, 54, son of Marky's founders Rivka and the late Azriel Karp, cited the economy for his "quick decision" to shut the landmark eatery's doors, which leaves Toronto without a kosher sit-down delicatessen.

"I believe there is an economic crisis in the Orthodox world. People are focusing on their priorities, such as school and synagogue, and there is less and less money left for restaurant meals."

As well, according to Karp, many Conservative Jews are not strict about eating in kosher establishments. "Part of the [kosher] market has disappeared."

He said that four other local kosher meat restaurants – King Solomon's Table, Miami Grill, 398 West, and Delicacies Bar and Grill – have closed recently, and "the fact that my business did not increase at all tells me something. It is clear what is happening."

Karp said that his parents, who met in Israel, and moved to Toronto in 1968 via Montreal, bought a non-kosher restaurant with the idea of making it kosher.

"It was one of the first few kosher restaurants in the city, and they brought in a European/Zionist attitude. Not only was the food delicious, but it became a social place, with a lot of young Israelis hanging out," he said.

"My mother was a great cook. She converted a lot of recipes into kosher, and everything is made from scratch. We still pickle and smoke our own meat and grind our own breadcrumbs. Chicken fingers are a favourite [for all ages.]"

Erez Karp

Karp, a lawyer by profession, took over Marky's in 1988. "My first job there was washing dishes when I was 11 years old. I had to stand on a box to reach the sink. I have [since] worked every position in the restaurant."

He said despite popular belief, the restaurant business does not involve extra-long hours.

"We just work different hours than everyone else. We open up when everyone has already started working, and when they come in for dinner after work, we're working."

He said he has no immediate plans for his post-Marky's future.

"It all happened very quickly. I haven't had a chance to figure it out."

Federation reinstates funding for Yiddish

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has reversed its decision to stop funding its Committee for Yiddish, a change that took effect July 1.

In a July 11 email to committee president Mark Egit, Adam Minsky, the federation's senior vice-president of community capacity building, wrote that, "effective immediately, UJA Federation is committed to providing the following:

1. Part-time staff support to the Committee for Yiddish.
2. Program grant funding in the amount of $20,000 per year. [The amount is $16,000 less than the $36,000 the committee received last year.]
3. Complimentary meeting space in the Lipa Green Centre."

As well, Minsky added, the professional staff person assigned to the committee would likely change. Ester Klimitz, who served as the committee's part-time co-ordinator, will remain on staff until September to ensure a smooth transition, Minsky wrote.

The changes are considered "an interim solution" for the coming year until a long-term plan is worked out, according to an email from federation spokesperson Dan Horowitz to committee supporters.

Sol Hermolin, a member of the Committee for Yiddish and president of the Yiddish Vinkl (an independent group), told The CJN, "At this point we have to scramble and get flyers and ads out and let the community know that classes will be starting again and the theatre workshop will be going on.

"It looks like we'll be carrying on as we did before, but we'll try and have a stronger presence in the community, so something like this doesn't happen again," he added.

Masterminds gloat as murdered are mourned

One day after a suicide bomber killed five Israelis, wounded two dozen more and killed one Bulgarian at the airport in Burgas, Bulgaria, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad preened over the atrocity.

"The bitter enemies of the Iranian people and the Islamic Revolution have recruited most of their forces in order to harm us," Ahmadinejad said. "They have indeed succeeded in inflicting blows upon us more than once, but have been rewarded with a far stronger response."

He was responding directly to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu who, earlier that day, had accused Iran and Hezbollah of involvement in the slaughter.

Despite a transparent effort on the weekend by Bahman Kalbasi, a BBC lackey for Ahmadinejad, denying that Ahmadinejad's remarks related to the Burgas murders, and despite the farcical statement by an Iranian foreign ministry spokesman, Ramin Mehmanparast, earlier in the week that "Iran's position is to condemn all terrorist acts in the world," the import of Ahmadinjed's remarks was clear. By boasting about his country's "far stronger response" merely hours after Netanyahu had pointed the finger of responsibility at Tehran as the dead and wounded were being flown back to Israel, the unsubtle Iranian leader merely confirmed what knowledgeable observers and government leaders suspected: that Iran had indeed brought last week's terror onto the fields of Bulgaria.

Indeed, that the Burgas suicide bomber acted on behalf of Iran has now been clearly established.

As reported in the New York Times last week, American officials confirmed that the bomber was a member of the Iranian terror surrogate, Hezbollah, and was "acting under broad guidance" to hit Israeli targets.

The Burgas atrocity was committed 18 years to the day after the Iranian-directed terrorist slaughter of 85 people at the AMIA Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires. Hundreds more were injured in that attack. Six Iranians are still on Interpol's most wanted list for that attack, including current Iranian Defence Minister Gen. Ahmed Vahidi.

Unchecked, the thuggish, murderous theocrats of Tehran will simply implement more of their hegemonic ambitions, wreaking more of the deadly havoc and political instability that have become their signature. Its involvement in the Syrian regime's battle with its own people is merely a grossly obvious example of Tehran's way.

Ahmadinejad gloats with smug, religiously sanctified self-assurance about the murders he and his agents mastermind while the families of the murdered mourn.

At what point will western leaders draw the line with the leaders of Iran?

Two states now (1)

What Arie Raif proposes in "Two states now, peace later" (July 5) is precisely what the Palestinians are demanding "now," without specifying what will happen later: evacuation of settlements; Israeli withdrawal from the eastern part of Jerusalem, including the Temple Mount; abandoning most of the West Bank. But at least some Palestinian officials have the honesty to say that such moves will eventually seal the death of Israel, as Abbas Zaki, a member of the Fatah Central Committee, stated on Sept. 23, 2011, in an Al Jazeera interview: "Everybody understands that the greater goal cannot be accomplished in one go. If Israel withdraws from Jerusalem, evacuates the settlers and dismantles the wall, what will become of Israel? It will come to an end... If one says that one wants to wipe Israel out... it's not an acceptable policy to say so. Don't say these things to the world. Keep it to yourself." Need I say more?

Two states now (2)

Arie Raif in "Two states now, peace later" (July 5) espouses the typical left-wing view in relation to the peace-making process, which is blame the right wing, give away land to try to placate the enemy and hope that this will be sufficient to bring about peace.

As a civil litigation lawyer, I am an advocate of the mediation process. Mediation usually leads to a settlement. However, it requires the parties to come to the table without preconditions and with an open mind to bring about a resolution. It is absurd and ludicrous for Israel to come to the negotiation table by submitting to preconditions and furthermore being told what the ultimate resolution of such a negotiation is before negotiating.

It is clear from a historical perspective and from the comments of Palestinian leaders that any settlement is an interim agreement, as the ultimate goal still remains the destruction of the State of Israel. A resolution of this conflict will only come about once the Palestinians come to the realization that Israel is not a temporary but a permanent entity.

Church report on 'Israel/Palestine' (1)

The CJN has published a number of articles relating to the August meeting of the General Council of the United Church of Canada, which will vote on a proposed church policy regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. I recently wrote to the Rev. Mardi Tindal, moderator of the United Church of Canada, as follows:

"I take issue with many parts of the report [of the church's working group on Israel/Palestine policy]... that delegates... will discuss in August. The report contains significant factual errors and distortions, which are unworthy of a respected body such as the United Church of Canada. The report contains a direct comparison of the Holocaust to the challenges faced by Palestinians. It questions Israel's status as a Jewish state. It blames Israel's presence in the West Bank as a primary contributor of injustice that underlies the violence of the region. The report makes no mention of Hamas and Hezbollah, which are committed to the destruction of the State of Israel and the annihilation of the Jewish People.

"Christians in Israel enjoy full rights as citizens. Your church should compare this to Saudi Arabia and other Arabs states where churches are simply not allowed. If you want to discuss oppression, why not deal with the plight of the Coptics in Egypt or the ongoing murders of Christians in Nigeria. The report's focus on Israel as opposed to the abuse of Christians in the rest of the world smacks of antisemitism."

Church report on 'Israel/Palestine' (2)

There is nothing fairly "balanced" about the United Church's working group's report on Israel/Palestine policy ("The United Church report," Letters, July 5). The fact that the church would even consider studying the boycotting of Israel while ignoring all of the rest of the Middle East is blatant antisemitism.

The circumcision dilemma

Rabbi Wayne Allen

Shortly after a judge in a district court in Cologne, Germany, ruled that circumcision was the equivalent of "grievous bodily harm" and left open the possibility that both doctors who perform the surgery and parents who permit it might be subject to criminal prosecution, CTV News contacted me for an interview. As a representative of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, I would be asked for an "on-air" reaction. Aside from confirming time and place for the interview, the producer asked me for some "talking points." I responded that while I recognize the fact that is was a German court that issued this ruling, I would prefer to focus on the content of the decision and its context. I was prepared to demonstrate how its reasoning was flawed yet entirely explicable given a secular society that privileges individual rights over communal values. I was not interested in making visceral attacks against antisemitism. But what I wanted to avoid was precisely what the producer wanted to include. So I was "dis-invited" to appear.

The fact that the ruling was issued by a German court within living memory of the Shoah is chilling. And, as columnist Michael Gerson noted in the Washington Post, antisemitism has always been as much about Jewish bodies as it has been about Jewish beliefs. But simply dismissing the Cologne ruling as a manifestation of historic antisemitism is too neat and simple. After all, the ruling could have just as well been issued in Sweden, Norway, Finland, the Netherlands or San Francisco (where a proposed ban on circumcision was removed from a ballot measure by a Superior Court judge in July, 2011). It is true that antisemites (read "Nazis") cited the practice of circumcision as an example of the inherent cruelty of Jews, thus paving the way for the Shoah. But historian Robin Judd, in her 2007 book titled Contested Rituals, shows that Jewish parents in Germany were already abandoning the practice of infant circumcision as early as 1843, long before the rise of National Socialism.

Rabbi Wayne Allen

Unlike antisemitic vitriol directed against circumcision, the Cologne judge did not condemn infant ritual circumcision as cruel, barbaric or primitive. That judgment, it seems, belongs to Jewish groups such as NoCirc, Intact or JAC (Jews Against Circumcision). The Cologne judge argued that circumcision "permanently and irreparably" changes the human body, causing a "not insignificant loss of substance." Of course the same could be said about an amputation. But amputations are not illegal, because they are, presumably, medically justified. Medical justification is an exception to the rule of maintaining bodily integrity. Any surgical procedure that cannot be medically justified is mutilation and criminal. On this basis, female genital cutting, including clitoridectomy and infibulation, would similarly be banned.

No doubt some defenders of ritual circumcision would hasten to claim that medical justification is precisely why circumcision ought to be endorsed. While medical opinion and scientific studies are far from unanimous, current opinion considers circumcision useful in promoting better genital hygiene and preventing the transmission of disease, as well as effective in controlling AIDS. That is why circumcision is being promoted in Africa. The best interests of society are served by encouraging circumcision, not banning it. The judge considered the medical testimony, but was assured by experts that there is no advantage to circumcision in countries, such as Germany, with better hygienic awareness and practice than in Africa.

The judge also understood that Jews (and Muslims) do not defend circumcision on the basis of medical justification. On this point, the judge was absolutely correct. Besides, medical opinions do change. And once Jews begin to tie rituals to medical science, there is an inherent danger: should the reigning scientific opinion change, ritual would have to change as well. If, for example, fasting on Yom Kippur were defended on the grounds that an occasional fast serves to purge the digestive system of toxins and promote better health, it would have to be rejected if new studies indicated that depriving the human body of nutrients for more than a day disrupts regular metabolism and inhibits the production of desirable hormones.

The judge was also correct in omitting the issue of pain. He did not argue that circumcision is painful – even though many Jews have that impression. Babies cry as much – if not more – from being exposed and restrained than from the very short surgical procedure itself. And with an analgesic, whether wine or the application of lidocaine, or both, the pain is mitigated, if not eliminated. And I have attended a number of brit milah ceremonies when the baby did not cry at all. The judge was not concerned with the issue of pain, because libertarian society accepts the possibility of imposing momentary pain for long-term gain. That is why vaccinations are advocated and sometimes mandated.

However, the judge erred in arguing that circumcision "permanently and irreparably" changes the anatomy. He is wrong on two counts. First, circumcision is reversible. Jewish history, particularly during the Hellenistic period, mentions how some men in attempting to fit in with the Greeks who had to participate naked in the gymnasium, reversed their circumcisions through the manual stretching of the remaining foreskin or through surgery. While neither method may seem attractive, they are certainly available. Second, to argue that an anatomical part is "irreparable" is to argue that the part is broken, no longer able to serve its natural and beneficial purpose. What the natural and beneficial purpose of the foreskin might be is difficult to identify, particularly since the judge conceded that the foreskin can be a sponge for harmful bacterial growth. Moreover, it is unusual – but not rare – for males to be born without foreskins and with no identifiable disadvantage. According to Jewish lore, Adam, Jacob, Moses and David among others were born this way. (Interestingly, the rabbis considered aposthia as an indication of saintliness rather than deformity.) Were foreskins considered essential, doctors would be promoting restorative surgery for aposhthiac babies which, of course, is not the case.

But what impelled the judge to rule as he did is the emergence of individualism as the pre-eminent societal value. At the dawn of the modern period, Judaism welcomed this nascent socio-political concept. No longer would Jews be barred from professions or neighbourhoods solely on the basis of the group to which they belonged. The demise of "corporativism" – as historian David Rudavsky described it – was accompanied by the disintegration of the ghetto and the full admission of Jews into western society. Exemplified by towering personalities such as Moses Mendelssohn, Jews could now rise as high as their own individual talents would take them. But this radical change came with a price. Aside from the threat of rampant assimilation, individualism challenged the cherished idea of Judaism as a covenantal community. Traditionally, Jews saw themselves as members of a collective with shared values and a shared destiny rather than as a voluntary association of individuals. Judaism was seen as a system of obligations that supersedes individual choice. In this system, circumcision is considered a ceremony of initiation in which an eight-day-old male is introduced to the covenant and added to the ranks of Jewish community. It is reason to rejoice. But increasingly today, individual "rights" are trumping religious "rites."

Oil painting by Giovanni Bellini

The Cologne judge reflected this reality in his ruling when he argued that membership in a religious body is a voluntary choice that must be made by an adult. Parents can no longer make that choice for a child. Religion cannot be imposed. It can only be adopted. Further, children are not the "property" of parents who have power over them but individuals for whom parents have responsibilities, including protecting them from physical assault. Should a child grow up and wish to adopt Judaism, let him choose to be circumcised then.

It remains to be seen how this ruling will play out over time, particularly since it leaves certain questions unaddressed. For instance, research has shown that Down Syndrome children who undergo facial reconstruction surgery and are subsequently treated as "normal" children tend to succeed in school far better than those who do not undergo surgery. To be sure, the surgery is not "life-saving." Given the absence of medical justification, would parents who opt for the surgery be subject to criminal penalties? And if not, that is, if aesthetic or psychological justification sufficiently outweighs a child's bodily integrity, why wouldn't religious justification? But what this ruling clearly does is highlight the dilemma faced by modern Jews. On the one hand, we applaud and cherish the values that are the hallmark of the modern period. These are the same values affirmed by the German judge: the protection of the person against harm, individual rights and freedom of choice. Yet at the same time, we want to preserve our sacred tradition.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper asserted that "the declaration of one person in a German court will have zero impact on the Jewish people." Perhaps so. But the dilemma exposed by the recent ruling endures.

How I discovered the Talmud

As the date of the global Siyum Hashas, the celebration of the completion of a cycle of Talmud, study draws near, I find myself thinking about my own belated discovery of the joys of Talmud.

Although I had a fulsome Jewish education, it was not until my graduate school days that I began to learn Talmud. Oh, I encountered a talmudic text here and there – mostly aggadah (stories), sometimes bits of halachic deliberation, but never an entire sugya (analysis). When I was growing up, I didn't know of a single girl or woman who learned Talmud. In our co-ed school, girls studied Mishnah, while boys learned Gemara.

I'd like to say that even in those days, my soul yearned to swim in the sea of Talmud – but that would not be precise. Because I did not have a sense of what Talmud study was, I didn't know to desire it. But what I did yearn for, even then, was to be able to study what the boys studied. In my school, the boys' schooling continued after hours – one night a week, and Sunday mornings.

I organized the girls in my Grade 5 class, and together we requested that we, too, be offered this opportunity. After a bit of resistance, the principal acceded to our demand. "Get to school Sunday morning," he told us, "and we'll begin."

We showed up at 8 a.m, and our principal was there, waiting. So was our "home economics" teacher. As the boys filed into their classrooms, we followed our home-ec teacher into the kitchen. Our task was to prepare a hearty and tasty breakfast for our male classmates, who would surely be hungry after a morning of study.

So it was that my encounter with the Talmud was deferred for more than a decade. Years later, when I was a graduate student at Brandeis University, several of my friends organized a Talmud study group that met one morning a week in someone's apartment. The group was self-directed, chevrutah-style, rather than led by a teacher. They invited me to join them. Tentatively, I accepted.

I quickly realized I was in over my head. The responsibility for taking the lead rotated among the members of the group. Each week, a different person was charged with doing advance preparation, working through the text to be studied, doing outside research if necessary. There were four of us: a Judaic studies PhD student at Harvard University who went on to rabbinic ordination, a graduate student in Bible, a sofer and me.

My colleagues in study radically outpaced me. My knowledge of Aramaic was ad hoc and acquired, over time, by osmosis, and I'd never worked through a page of Talmud. I felt I should do the gracious thing and offer to quit, but my friends encouraged me to try to stick it out.

Sara R. Horowitz

in Toronto

The section of Gemara we chose – I shouldn't say "we," because I was clueless – wasn't an easy one for a beginner. It was Ketubot – marriage contracts – and very complex. Typical for the Talmud, it began by plunging into a discussion not of marriage contracts, but of divorce. It took weeks before I ventured to shoulder my responsibility to prepare the text in advance. This was before the wonderful translations into modern Hebrew and English were available. I struggled, pitted myself against the text, making friends with Aramaic dictionaries and talmudic reference works.

I was way out of my comfort zone, but I was hooked. I had never encountered material so intellectually difficult and so stimulating. And the discourse of voices in the text brought the personalities and minds of long-ago people into the present, as though they were sitting around the kitchen table with us. The vignettes, dilemmas and illustrations brought us slices of life from the past, opening a window onto the daily lives and passions of our ancestors. I was seduced by threads of argument that seemingly meander and digress, only to forge an exquisite weave of text.

"So this is what it is," I remember thinking.

And how wonderful to celebrate not only a cycle of study, but a changed world where girls and women, too, had access to this Judaic treasure.

Rabbis and same-sex marriages

For several years, when the Reform movement needed a dinosaur from its ranks to debate the issue of same-sex marriage, I'd be invited to sit on panels and make presentations. Because I had been among the relatively few Reform rabbis who had publicly argued against performing same-sex ceremonies, even after the movement sanctioned them, it made me a sought-after, but less-than-welcome, guest.

I had two main arguments, one formal and one substantive. The formal reason for not officiating at same-sex ceremonies was that as the state didn't sanction them, I wasn't prepared to be involved in something that at some point could jeopardize my Ontario licence to perform marriages. Since then, however, the province has changed its law and, therefore, that argument is no longer valid.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

My substantive reason against officiating is now also being challenged. I had stated that I couldn't find justification for same-sex unions in tradition, however leniently interpreted. But recently, the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards of the Rabbinical Assembly, the governing body of the Conservative rabbinate in North America, has sanctioned them.

The Conservative movement has always maintained that it's committed to Halachah, Jewish law. It seems to continue to do so also after this ruling. Thus, for example, almost at the same time as it decided in favour of same-sex marriage, it also issued a statement urging its adherents to refrain from using electronic devices on Shabbat. Both rulings, its spokespeople insist, are consistent with Jewish law. The former celebrates human dignity irrespective of sexual orientation, which they maintain takes precedence over much else, whereas the latter seeks to enhance Sabbath sanctity, which is central to the Jewish way of life.

Whenever I've argued with my Reform colleagues against seemingly fundamental departures from Jewish tradition on the grounds that such actions may isolate us from the rest of the Jewish people, I'd be told that in due course, the Conservatives will embrace the Reform stance, and between them, they're the majority. Both movements seek to attract the same non-Orthodox Jews and, therefore, they're compelled to adapt to the "market." Reform rabbis, more openly ready to modify Jewish law, just get there earlier.

Apparently it's this need to catch up with Reform that created a split within Canadian Conservative Judaism, resulting in de facto two Conservative organizations here. The latest ruling about same-sex marriage will probably deepen the rift. The fact that the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards has devised ceremonies that exclude the traditional notion of marriage as kiddushin, sanctification decreed by God, isn't likely to convince the dissenters.

But it has deprived me of my strongest argument against officiating at same-sex unions. As I retired from the pulpit rabbinate a dozen years ago and nowadays am rarely called upon to conduct marriages, this won't have any practical consequences for me. Nevertheless, I'm being challenged to rethink my position.

Needless to say, often when I've argued against same-sex marriage ceremonies, I've been accused of homophobia. In my defence, I'd bring evidence that the congregation I served in London had already in the 1970s created a gay chavurah; that it would accept gay couples as members on the same basis as straight couples, and that I had been actively involved in campaigning for equal civil rights for gays and lesbians, etc.

I doubt whether any of this convinced my critics. They may also have failed to understand why I advocated civil marriage for gays and lesbians while refusing to officiate at such unions. The fact that I'm strongly in favour of civil marriage, in Israel no less than in Canada, which includes marriage between Jews and non-Jews, yet wouldn't officiate at such ceremonies on traditional grounds, may have added to the confusion.

In view of recent developments, reflected in the decision by the Conservative movement, and the popular approval with which it has been greeted, it's likely that had I still been serving a congregation today, I'd have to modify my stance and officiate. As important as it may be for a rabbi to adhere to principles and beliefs, he or she is also duty-bound to serve the people. And the current mood in the Jewish world is decidedly in favour of officiating at same-sex marriages.

Happily, there're many rabbis serving congregations today who say they're willing and eager to do so. I respect, nay applaud, them.

Chief rabbi combats xenophobia in Turkey

When Isak Haleva, the chief rabbi of Turkey, was teaching a Hebrew language course at an Islamic theological seminary in Istanbul, he was gratified to learn that his Muslim students were of the view that Judaism and Islam share common values. But on the flip side, he discovered that some of his pupils harboured misconceptions about Judaism and Jews, he said in an interview in his ornate office in the heart of this pulsating city.

Disturbed by the anti-Jewish stereotypes tumbling forth from their mouths, Rabbi Haleva resolved to do something about it.

With moral support from the Jewish community and funds from the European Union, he launched an interfaith program some years ago designed to break down barriers between Jews and Muslims in Turkey.

Sheldon Kirshner in Istanbul

"The duty of religion is to bring people together," he said through an interpreter who translated his Turkish into English.

Rabbi Haleva, who sat under a sombre oil portrait of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, Turkey's George Washington, added, "This is a concept that has been all too often forgotten. Some people, regrettably, have used religion to sow disunity between different religious groups. Religion should not create conflict. Religious leaders should be role models."

With these utopian ideas inspiring and galvanizing him, Rabbi Haleva established a bridge-building program to introduce Muslims in Istanbul to Judaism and Jewish culture.

Thanks to his initiative, Muslim high school students have visited synagogues, and theology students have listened to the rabbi expound on Jewish beliefs and customs. And in the program's piece de resistance, Rabbi Haleva brought 18 Turkish theologians to Bar-Ilan University, in Tel Aviv, for a round of lectures and meetings.

Asked to assess the impact of the program, Rabbi Haleva said it has been beneficial in combating prejudice.

Since his appointment as chief rabbi a decade ago, he has promoted the spirit of ecumenism. His dedication to this task is evident in several of the framed photographs that hang on his walls. They show him posing with such dignitaries as Pope Benedict XVI, the current Dalai Lama, U.S. President Barack Obama and Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan.

Despite the rabbi's dedication to building a kinder, gentler world bereft of intolerance, misunderstanding and strife, Turkey is hardly free of anti-Jewish animus and stereotypes.

Three years ago, Yilmaz Esmer, a Turkish academic at Bahcesehir University, released a survey on Muslim attitudes toward Jews, and the results were disheartening. The survey, funded by the British Foreign and Commonwealth Office, found that almost two-thirds of Muslim Turks did not want Jewish neighbours. A Pew Research Center survey conducted a year earlier was just as discouraging, finding that three-quarters of Muslim Turks viewed Jews negatively, while only seven per cent expressed favourable opinions of Jews.

"There are widespread negative attitudes to Jews in Turkey," said Esmer, a secular Muslim. "The majority of Turks do not want Jewish, or foreign, neighbours."

Yilmaz Esmer

In a reference to the xenophobia present in Turkish society, he observed, "There is a low degree of tolerance. Turks don't want people who are different."

Esmer believes that xenophobia has grown due to Israel's political disputes with Turkey in recent years. As a result, he noted, Turks generally have trouble distinguishing between Jews and Israelis.

In his view, Erdogan fanned xenophobia by harshly condemning Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip in 2009 and by verbally attacking Israeli President Shimon Peres at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, a year later.

In an angry exchange, Erdogan, referring to Israel's thrust into Gaza, declared, "When it comes to killing, you know well how to kill." In a rejoinder, Peres responded that Turkey would also have reacted militarily had enemy rockets fallen on Istanbul.

"The [Turkish] people liked what Erdogan told Peres," said Esmer. "He was seen as standing up for Muslims."

Although Erdogan is not perceived as antisemitic, having denounced antisemitism as a crime, he is basically anti-Israel and plays to such sentiment in Turkey, Esmer stated. He is concerned that the Davos affair, as well as the Mavi Marmara incident, which took place four months later, have prompted some Turks to regard the Arab-Israeli conflict in religious terms.

Antisemitism is rooted in Turkish Muslim society, particularly in lower socio-economic echelons, he said. But antisemitism is not as deeply embedded in Turkey as in Iran, Saudi Arabia or Syria.

As for Muslim theology, he observed: "There are verses in the Qur'an that are anti-Jewish. But you can also find positive references to Jews in the Qur'an. You can find what you want."

Esmer suggested that ultra-nationalists and Islamists, as well as leftwingers who do not bother to differentiate between antisemitism and anti-Zionism, have propagated anti-Jewish tropes.

Examples abound.

Writing in the Islamist newspaper Milli Gazete, columnist Fahri Guven accused Jews of overthrowing the Ottoman Empire and equated Judaism with treason. In the far right-wing newspaper Ortadogu Gazetesi, columnist Selcuk Duzgun complained that Adolf Hitler "did not do enough to these Jews."

Comparing Israel's leadership to "any other racist-fascist regime," Murat Belge, a professor of English literature, claimed that the international community tolerates Israeli policies because of "the very strong Jewish presence in western societies."

Rabbi Isak Haleva sits under an oil painting of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk.

Antisemitism crops up even when Israel is not the topic at hand. When the renowned Turkish novelist Orhan Pamuk wrote that a million Armenian Christians had been killed in the Ottoman Empire during World War I, right-wing nationalists condemned him as "a Jew-lover" and "the servant of Jews."

However, columnists in mainstream newspapers such as Hurriyet and Radikal have denounced antisemitism.

The Turkish government has not been passive, having initiated legal proceedings against two authors, Cemal Anadol and Mustafa Akgun, who defamed Jews in Turkey Under the Threat of Israel and Zionism and The Wooden Sword of the Jew.

According to Esmer, Turkey is considering the possibility of introducing anti-hate legislation to supplement existing clauses in the criminal code that deal with such matters. "But there is no consensus on this issue," he said, "and no one knows when it will happen."

Toronto woman finds link in prewar pictures of Polish Jewry

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

It was just by fluke that Rosalie Selick and her husband, Avram, ended up visiting a photo exhibit of prewar Polish Jewry on a trip to Madrid this past February.

The retired public school principal, who had accompanied a group of exchange students to Spain as a chaperone, was stunned to discover that her aunt and uncle were in one of the pictures, unidentified.

With a couple of days on their own in Madrid, the Selicks decided to take a guided walking tour. Part of the way through, Avram noticed a poster outside a Jewish cultural centre advertising the exhibit, titled And I Still See Their Faces – Images of Polish Jews.

"We didn't want to stray from the group, so we made a mental note to try and find it [again]," Rosalie said in an interview at her Toronto home. They returned the next day.

When she happened on the group shot that included her aunt and uncle, she was "frozen," she said, but once she regained her composure, she asked the curator for more information about where the picture came from.

Selick was surprised to learn that the Shalom Foundation exhibit she saw at the Casa-Sefarad Israel had been in Toronto almost 10 years ago.

The foundation's director, Golda Tencer – a child of survivors and an actor, in Warsaw's National Jewish Theatre – initiated the project in 1994 with an appeal for prewar photos of Polish Jews. She received 9,000 pictures and published the project in book form in 1996.

Selick marvels at the series of coincidences that led her to discover the picture: she happened to be in Madrid, happened to learn of the exhibition, and the picture with her aunt and uncle happened to be one of the ones on display.

Most of the pictures were provided by non-Jewish Poles, Selick noted. "There were many [Poles] who were good to their Jewish neighbours, and many Jews who gave their pictures to their neighbours for safekeeping."

She stressed that the real story isn't her own, but that of the Shalom Foundation and the book. "Even if you don't know the people [in the pictures,] it's nice to know they won't be forgotten."

The name "Tajblum" wasn't familiar to Selick, who was born here in 1953, five years after her parents immigrated. Her 96-year-old father, Sol Daniels – a native of Oksa, Poland, outside of Warsaw – recognized a friend of his brother's when Selick showed him the picture after she returned to Toronto: Moishe Aba was the name of the man at the bottom right. He survived the war and moved to France.

Selick's cousin, Dena Wolfe, had never seen that picture of her parents, who married before the war and survived in Russia. Her father was in a Russian prison for seven years. Another snippet of information: Wolfe remembered that her parents had visited Moishe Aba in France.

Selick emailed the Shalom Foundation to ask for more information, particularly the name of the person who had provided the photo.

Within days, she received an e-mail from Rivka Slomka Ostaszewski of Springfield, N.J., a board member of the Shalom Foundation in Warsaw and of the Friends of the Shalom Foundation in the United States.

Ostaszewski had sent the picture to Tencer for the project. The two women are childhood friends who attended Jewish school together in Lodz in the 1960s and late 1950s.

Ostaszewski, who immigrated to the United States in 1971, told The CJN she didn't know much about the picture, because her late mother, one of 10 siblings who had lost all her blood relatives in the Holocaust, didn't like to talk about what had happened to her.

Five of her relatives are in the picture: two uncles and their wives, and a young cousin (all the people in the middle row, and the man at the top left). Only one of the aunts survived. She remarried and moved to Melbourne, Australia.

Ostaszewski said she was shocked but excited to hear from Selick, and, she added, she was sorry to learn that Selick had missed the exhibit when it was in Toronto. Now, Ostaszewski said, there is no one she can ask for more information about the picture and connections between the two families.

But, Ostaszewski said she's glad to have learned as much as she did.

She noted that other people have also discovered pictures of relatives in the Shalom Foundation collection. Some of them had no other pictures of their loved ones. Without those pictures, she said, the people in them "would have just perished."

'One of the best Canada has ever produced'

But Binstock's old coach and friend, George Shermer, believes if he and Reader play up to their potential and things go right, the pair can make it to the Olympic quarter-finals. And from there, anything can happen, Shermer said.

At six-foot-five, Binstock has the size to be successful, but there's more to his game than that. "He's tremendously co-ordinated, and mentally, he can focus really well," said Shermer. "He's definitely one of the best beach players Canada has ever produced."

Even for a gifted athlete like Binstock, attaining a national status did not come without setbacks, Shermer continued. "What really held Josh back for a few years was that he developed a serious injury in his shoulder. He needed major reconstructive surgery and it took a lot of physical rehabilitation to get back to compete with the best players in beach [volleyball].

"Nobody believed he could recover and be good enough versus the good, younger players out there," Shermer said. "But Josh is not a quitter. He got a partner that complemented his play and they have a chance to get to the quarter-finals – one of the eight best teams out of 24 countries competing."

Shermer's association with Binstock goes back 15 years to the time when he coached the JCC Blues, a hardcourt volleyball team at the now defunct Bathurst Street Jewish Community Centre.

A native of Czechoslovakia who excelled in volleyball, Shermer took on the coaching job to provide his three sons with a competitive environment in a Jewish milieu. The Blues were one of the city's best teams.

Binstock was also a key member of the team that Shermer coached at the JCC Maccabi Games – an event that brings together the best Jewish teen athletes in North America each summer.

Binstock, along with Shermer's sons Elie and Daniel, also competed in hardcourt volleyball at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Though the team did not win a medal, its presence in Israel marked the return of Canada to volleyball competition after a 20-year hiatus.

Back from Israel, Binstock continued to work out with Shermer, training at Beach Blast, an indoor facility Shermer owns and operates. As Binstock developed as an athlete, Shermer could see he possessed "the strong will and perseverance" necessary to attain excellence.

Next summer, Binstock will again represent Canada – this time at the Maccabiah Games in Israel. He'll be back on the hardcourt as the Canadians stack their team in a bid to upset the favoured Israeli national team. Joining Binstock on the Canuck squad will be Daniel and Joshua Shermer and Sam Schachter, an up-and-comer on the Canadian beach scene. Schachter has already won the Under-21 World Championship and has a good shot at representing Canada at the next Olympics, Shermer said.

And behind Binstock and Schachter, there's yet another, younger, elite Jewish volleyballer, Shermer said. He's Cole Grossinger, who was recently invited by Ontario Volleyball to train at its summer High Performance Centre.

Blog prompts camp to reverse decision about blind camper

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Camp Ramah in Canada and the Jewish community learned a lesson last week about the power of social media.

Rabbi David Krishef, a Ramah parent, blogged about the Utterson, Ont., camp's decision to send his blind son, Solomon, home early, because it couldn't accommodate the boy's special needs.

The decision was reversed last Thursday, the day after the blog entry was posted and shared on Facebook and Twitter, prompting dozens of emails to the camp and its oversight body, the National Ramah Commission, to protest the treatment of Solomon, 15, by the camp, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement. Rabbi Krishef's blog can be found at http://embodiedtorah.wordpress.com.

Following the camp's new decision, Rabbi Krishef, who is spiritual leader of Congregation Ahavas Israel in Grand Rapids, Mich., posted a followup blog entry last Thursday night. In it, he wrote that camp director Ron Polster had apologized and reassigned staff so that Solomon could remain at camp for the rest of the summer.

As well, the rabbi apologized "for the damage I have done to the reputation of Camp Ramah in Canada... I did so only because I thought it was the only way that I could effect change."

Siyum HaShas events unite Jews worldwide

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

It may be a surprising crowd for New Jersey's MetLife Stadium: 100,000 Jews, mostly men in dark jackets and hats – but it's no surprise that the 12th Siyum HaShas on Aug. 1 will draw a huge crowd, says Rabbi David Appelrouth of the Forest Hill Jewish Centre in Toronto.

"It's going to be a very powerful experience."

Celebrating the 12th completion of a daily cycle of Talmud study known as Daf Yomi ("a page a day"), the event marks the largest celebration of Jewish learning in over 2,000 years, according to MySiyum.com. It is organized by several Jewish outreach organizations.

The term shas is an acronym for the shisha sidrei (six orders) of Mishnah comprising the oral Torah, given at Mount Sinai along with the written Torah, Rabbi Appelrouth said.

After the Mishnah was written down, it was compiled with commentary into the Talmud, whose 63 tractates have been "the mainstay of Jewish academia for the last 2,000 years," local organizer Mark Mandelbaum said.

A siyum is a traditional celebration for completing any significant Jewish text.

It was inaugurated in 1923 by Rabbi Meir Shapiro, a Polish rabbi who desired unity among Jews and saw that certain tractates were being neglected. With over 2,700 pages, the cycle takes about 7-1/2 years.

"Tens of thousands of Jews around the globe study the daf on a daily basis," said Mandelbaum, who's proudly among them. "It's an enormous accomplishment… a big, big cause for celebration."

Since Rabbi Shapiro's time, groups and chavrutas (partners) have carried on, even through the Holocaust. While the first two siyums, in 1931 and 1938, attracted tens of thousands of European Jews, the third was marked only by scattered relics in Israel and Germany. Now, it's grown beyond anything they could have imagined.

"It's great to be in shul when it's packed on Rosh Hashanah – imagine a stadium that's packed," Rabbi Appelrouth said. He is taking his nine-year-old son to the MetLife gathering.

Toronto organizers are confident they'll fill the 3,200-seat Sony Centre. At the event, the last few words of the final tractate will be recited, Rabbi Appelrouth said. "There's an elaborate ceremony, followed by a lengthy Kaddish."

Then there's singing and dancing, followed by distinguished speakers. About half of the program will be broadcast live from MetLife, including Rabbi Yissocher Frand of Baltimore and Rabbi Yaakov Perlow, known as the Novominsker Rebbe and head of Agudath Israel, a coalition of haredi organizations.

Though Mandelbaum doesn't know of any women participating in Daf Yomi, they're welcome to attend. "Absolutely! This is a celebration of the Jewish community, [including] wives and spouses of people who study… Without their support, it wouldn't happen." Women will be seated in a separate section.

One woman, who is not attending, is "very proud" of her husband's accomplishment. "[Men] bring their Gemarah [Talmud] when they go away for yom tov. They learn even when a new baby is born. Obviously, this is all with the support of the wife. Throughout the cycle, my husband has shared with me things he has learned that he knew would interest me."

But, New York's Dov Weinstock said, "We have a number of women who participate on a daily basis" in his modern Orthodox Daf Yomi class. He's part of a group behind an alternative Aug. 6 Siyum HaShas study evening in New York (www.siyumhashas12.com) welcoming "all those with an interest in Talmud study… men, women and children.

"Our siyum reflects a more diverse and inclusive approach to Torah study."

With co-sponsors including Toronto's Torah in Motion, four of 14 teachers will be women. Another will be Toronto's Rabbi Martin Lockshin, who is also a CJN columnist.

Weinstock stresses that the two events are not mutually exclusive – many will attend both. His group aims to highlight the diversity within the Orthodox world. Like the Torah, the Talmud belongs to all Jews, and as Rabbi Appelrouth said, studying it has "been the main staple of Jewish living – it has sustained the Jewish People for thousands of years."

How to turn around Jewish education investments

Abraham H. Foxman
JTA

Much has been said and written about the financial priorities of the Jewish community and whether they are misdirected. All too often in these discussions, an artificial dichotomy is created between two goals: sustaining support for Israel and attending to the domestic priorities of the community.

Reams of paper have been used in arguing where the financial priorities of the community should lie.

We need more and more to integrate these two challenges: to recognize, as the Taglit-Birthright Israel project has, that rather than a competition, the twin goals of strengthening Israel and strengthening the local Jewish community are linked and reinforce each other.

I believe the best way to strengthen a Jewish community is through Jewish education. That is why, in my recent remarks to the Israeli Presidential Conference in Jerusalem, I called for a five-year, $500 million-per-year reinvestment in the Jewish Diaspora.

For whatever reason, it is very difficult to raise money in the Jewish community in North America for Jewish education. It has always been much easier to raise money for Israel. Raising funds for Israel is certainly important. But what if we redirected some of the community purse back locally for the purpose of giving the next generation the possibility of a fuller immersion into Jewish life through all that a Jewish education has to offer?

Education, among other things, makes the real Jewish connection to Israel. And the best way to ensure continued Jewish support for Israel is by having a highly identified Jewish community.

Let's face it: North American Jewish ignorance on Israel is the primary obstacle to Jewish identity, continuity and North American-based Zionism.

Here is where we are falling down as a community. Too many young Jews receive only rudimentary Jewish training. And those who do often stop studying and practising their faith at age 12 or 13, right after their bar mitzvah or bat mitzvah.

Abraham H. Foxman

Throughout the crucial teenage years, when peer pressures are intense and young people are truly learning what it means to be responsible adults in a confusing and challenging world, we neglect their spiritual development and allow the highly secular mass media and educational systems to work on them unchecked. When they go off to college, we hope that Hillel and other Jewish campus organizations will attract them. But why should they when our Jewish youth have seen their religion and their being Jewish treated as unimportant in their own homes and communities?

Why not let North American Jews continue to raise the money for Israel, but let Israel take the money and invest in North American Jewry. Invest in the infrastructure of day schools, whether Reform, Conservative, Orthodox or Reconstructionist and to make scholarships available so that Jewish schools can be more affordable, especially for those students most willing to continue their Jewish education through high school and beyond.

Times have changed.

Many years ago, when Israel was struggling to survive as a fledgling agrarian nation-state, $500 million would have been a princely sum. Today, Israel is a nation that has its own millionaires. The economy and tourism are robust and growing. That sum of $500 million is not as significant in Israel as it used to be.

Imagine how far we could advance Jewish education with such a commitment, which comes to $2.5 billion over five years. That is a significant sum of money for schools, scholarships and teachers.

A certain percentage of the money – perhaps 20 per cent – should be invested in programs to continue, enhance and ensure bringing young people to Israel. There should be no waiting list.

We have developed the most exciting audiovisual Jewish identity program that anyone could dream of and it is called Israel. We know it works. This is the tourniquet. I believe that if 100 children go to Israel, one-third will be Zionists forever, for one-third it won't matter and one-third will be "different." That is a pretty good investment for $3,000 per youngster.

The remaining 80 per cent of the money should be invested in Jewish education in North America – in expanding its infrastructure, in substantial tuition subsidies, and in paying teachers' salaries that will attract the best and brightest. Only an estimated 35 per cent of Jewish children are now attending private Jewish schools and yeshivas. The main reason is the cost

If I could, I would make Jewish day-school education at all levels available and affordable for as many Jewish families as possible. It would be expensive, but worth every penny. It could also help bring about a vibrant Jewish future in North America, which will reap benefits many times over in terms of future support for the Jewish State of Israel.

Siyum Hashas - completing the Talmud

On, Aug. 1, corresponding to the 13th of Av, 5772, thousands of people around the world will celebrate as they finish studying the 73rd page of the Tractate Niddah and thereby complete their study of the Talmud, known as Siyum Hashas. The very next day, they will begin learning the first tractate of the Talmud, Brachot. And they will continue in this shared learning experience until the entire Talmud is next completed on the seventh of Tevet, 5780 (Jan. 4, 2020)!

In the 1920s, Rabbi Meir Shapiro, the Lubliner Rav of Poland, had a ground-breaking idea: to unite Jews everywhere by having each of them study exactly the same text of Talmud on a daily basis. By reading a double-sided page (daf) a day (yomi), they would complete the Talmud's 2,711 pages in approximately seven years. [http://bit.ly/dafyomi10]

Rabbi Shapiro's vision has caught on. When the 11th Daf Yomi cycle was completed in March 2005, thousands of people crowded into Madison Square Garden and were linked by satellite with dozens of other communities around the world. [http://bit.ly/dafyomi11] You can watch a video of the late Bostoner Rebbe Levi Yitzchok Horowitz, as he explained the importance of the moment to the gathered crowd. [http://bit.ly/dafyomi12]

Written in Hebrew and Aramaic, the Talmud is the often-terse compendium of law, logic and philosophy that became the foundation for modern Judaism. Eric Chevlen does a very good job explaining the importance of the Talmud, its component sections of Mishnah and Gemara, as well as his own early challenges in learning a daf a day. [http://bit.ly/dafyomi13]

The best way to learn Talmud is under the guidance of a teacher or with a knowledgeable friend. But there are many online resources that can also help. The premier daf yomi site on the Web belongs to the Dafyomi Advancement Forum. [http://bit.ly/dafyomi16]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Why do so many people drag themselves out of bed, year after year, to learn the Talmud? Herman Wouk, author of This is My God and The Winds of War, explains: "Because by now the Talmud is in my bones. Its elegant and arcane ethical algebra, its soaked-in quintessential Jewishness, its fun, its difficulty, its accumulative virtue all balance against the cost in time and the so-called 'remoteness from reality.' Above and beyond all its other intellectual and cultural values, the Talmud is, for people like us, 'identity,' pure and ever springing." [http://bit.ly/dafyomi19]

Rabbi Aryeh Markman elected to complete the Talmud at the relatively leisurely pace of 15 years, but it had no less profound an effect. He writes, "As I stand in the end zone, I am reminded of the story of the man who went to the Kotzker Rebbe and announced with great pride: 'I went through Shas, the entire Talmud.' At that, the Kotzker looked at him and said, 'Very nice. Now tell me, did the Shas go through you?'

"Talmud study is all about changing oneself. Becoming wiser, more Jewishly committed, more connected to the Source of it all. They say that prayer is man's way of talking to God, and Talmud study is God talking to man. After 15 years, I'm starting to really listen." [http://bit.ly/dafyomi20]

Life is a bit like a movie

As I write this, an old and dear friend is struggling for his life.

This beloved rabbi – 43 years old, married with children, and whose wife is expecting another child in a month – was stricken with pneumonia, which was soon followed by a heart attack and kidney failure.

Life is indeed fragile.

And so, the old question of "Why do bad things happen to good people?" confronts me with painful immediacy.

According to the Talmud (Brachot 7a), Moses himself asked God this very question.

The story of Job, with which we are all familiar, treats this question at length.

Job was a thoroughly righteous person who had done little wrong to warrant the personal destruction he experienced. Yet Job lost his health, wealth and even his family.

The soul of Terach, Avraham's father, was reincarnated in and rectified by Job (Sha'ar HaGilgulim, Ch. 36) because God in His kindness created the concept of gilgulim – re-incarnations – so that no soul would be excluded from the world to come. (Ramban, Rabbeinu Bachya).

Indeed, the Arizal explains (Sha'ar HaGilgulim, Ch. 38) that in order to cleanse the soul, God creates incarnations so that the transgressor has opportunities to do tshuvah and reach purity. Consequently, it's next to impossible for us to figure out why we suffer. It is simply incumbent upon each of us to undergo our travails in order to improve our lot in this world and the world to come.

One thing is certain: just as mourners say, as they rend their clothing at the death of a close relative, "God is just," we have a mitzvah to judge others favourably, even when it seems they are guilty. Furthermore, should they be found guilty in the future, even then we should judge them with compassion, trying to understand with empathy how they arrived at their guilt. How much more so must we trust that God decides justly in every case, even if we fail to understand the judgment at the time!

We human beings are like moviegoers, watching a film on the screen and unaware of the diverse aspects required to make a film. We trust that the director has co-ordinated all of the parts and people to make something of worth and promise, even if we don't know where the script is going as we watch.

This is quite similar to life, except that in life, we are both viewers and actors. As actors, we know our roles, but as viewers we are unable to fathom the entire plot or to see the technical aspects of the production. We simply commit ourselves to the experience and trust the Director.

When bad things appear to happen to good people, perhaps we can draw comfort from this simple analogy, even though life is not a film, where we can leave the theatre at any time. In fact, God, our Director, as it were, is with us all through and after "the feature" – which is life. Trusting in this idea is a guiding principle and a comfort for us Jews.

We have much to be grateful for!

Zionism is in our DNA

Rivka Carmi

Guest Voice

The history of science and Zionism are intricately related. Both movements are rooted in the rationalism of the 19th century, which placed humanity at the heart of its own destiny.

Israel's first pioneers were optimists who believed in the power of people to change history. Their tools would be science and technology. This was to be the New-Old Land, a utopia envisioned by Theodor Herzl that would transform the desert region into a land of milk and honey.

This is the force and strength of Zionism that led to the creation of Israel, and it's this unbounded energy that has turned the country into the world's leading "start-up nation." It's not by chance that Israel's first and fourth presidents – Chaim Weizmann and Ephraim Katzir – were first and foremost scientists, or that a number of world-class research institutions were founded during the early years of the Jewish Yishuv, long before it was even clear if there would ever be a sovereign Jewish nation in this land. This year, the Technion – the Israeli Institute of Technology marked its centennial, while Hebrew University of Jerusalem is only a few years younger.

Some claim that Israeli higher education is "threatened" by "anti-Zionist" faculty members. But the truth is that the attention lavished on a few academics with extreme views has transformed them, falsely, into a symbol for all of Israeli academia. This does a genuine disservice to the significantly larger silent majority who are busy with teaching and research, more often than not in ways that benefit the country.

Last February, the Israeli Foreign Ministry released a report that showed the Israeli and Jewish press was distorting the importance of "Israeli Apartheid Week" (IAW), an annual event on college campuses around the world, by "magnifying the issue rather than playing it down."

According to the study, "Taking the apartheid frame (and the IAW activity itself) as the starting point for our actions paradoxically may strengthen the IAW brand and message, rather than weaken it."

A similar process is going on here.

In the name of "saving Israeli academia," some groups are doing real damage to the image of many of the country's most successful universities. In a world where Israel has enough enemies, it's distressing to see time and resources dedicated to fighting this non-battle.

By all international standards, Israeli universities are a huge success story that is in no way threatened by the political views of its people.

As president of the only university in Israel created by a decision of the Israeli government – to be a catalyst for development of the Negev region – I know that Ben-Gurion University of the Negev integrates the highest standards of intellectual thinking and research with the pioneering spirit that has defined its very development. As chair of the Committee of University Heads, I see the same spirit and commitment on other campuses.

I encourage you to visit an Israeli university today and learn more about how higher education has, and is, transforming this country.

Let's face it: Zionism is in our DNA.

Making educators of counsellors

Class Act

Daniel Held

I carry clear memories of my camp counsellors. David had a magical way of setting original stories to classical music. Each night at lights out, he would read a chapter, weaving his words with the movement of the music playing in the background. The cliffhanger at the end of the reading left us hounding him with questions throughout the next day.

Mike imbued us with Jewish curiosity. When he returned from a day off with a new poncho, he wondered aloud if he needed to put tzitzit on the four-cornered garment. The next night, after lights out, we went to the library and learned the Halachah with one of the camp educators.

Ofer, a shaliach, only spoke to us in Hebrew. It still isn't clear to me if this was clever pedagogy or a demonstration of his poor English. At the start of the summer, we couldn't understand him, but with enough repetition and charades, by the end of the summer, his mealtime requests in Hebrew for the milk or napkins to be passed down the dining hall table were clear, even to those with no prior Hebrew.

Notwithstanding their impact on my education and personal growth, like many counsellors, David, Mike, and Ofer likely wouldn't call themselves educators.

Counsellors play countless roles. They're group facilitators and social workers, sports specialists and swimming teachers, friends and confidants, nurses and in loco parentis. In the layers and layers of responsibility, and with a staff of seasonal workers largely comprising students pursuing careers in unrelated fields, the conscious role of educator is frequently buried.

The challenge of role identity is not isolated to camps. Across Hillels and youth movements, synagogues and travel programs, those who do educative work – connecting young people to Jewish activities, enacting experiences, and inculcating Jewish values – don't take on the label of educator, often reserving that title for those who teach formal classes.

Instead, we have developed a litany of amorphous terms such as adviser and chaperone, youth worker and engagement professional.

But they do educate. The most important educative role they play is that of serving as a dugmah ishit, a personal example. They're role models, teaching through act and word. The way they act and speak, the manner in which they treat others and the language they use, the consciousness with which they engage in Jewish life and living is eagerly observed and absorbed by their campers.

Without consciously considering these roles as educative roles, we belittle the impact they have on the life of youths.

It's a lot to ask of an 18-year-old university student to spend the summer acting as an educator and role model for children barely younger than himself. But we must help the counsellor see his role as deeper than simply a recreationist.

David, Mike and Ofer were natural educators. Reflecting back on my experiences as a camper, their educational impact was likely a natural outcome of their personalities.

If, however, they were to have conceived of themselves as educators, shaping experiences and teaching through the acts of daily living, their potential could have been even more profound.

No moral equivalence between Israel and Egypt on peace

New York Times columnist Tom Friedman has outdone himself.

In a July 3 piece, he argued that what he calls "a real peace" can be had between Israel and a Muslim Brotherhood-led Egypt if both change "some deeply ingrained behaviours."

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

A real peace, as opposed to the current "cold" peace, would involve people-to-people harmony. To achieve this, Friedman maintains, Israel would have to give up the naïve idea that it can have peace with a Mubarak-like dictator instead of with 80 million Egyptians. The Brotherhood, mindful of the need to deliver economic well-being to the masses under its rule, would have to endorse liberal values such as tolerance, pluralism, minority and individual rights – which would also lead to accepting Israel.

Friedman admits that this sort of transformation for the "deeply illiberal" Brotherhood is a "long shot." Still, he believes it's possible, especially if "liberal" Egyptians push the Brotherhood in that direction.

If Friedman's vision is anything other than a pipe dream, he'd have to provide even a faint indication of why the Brotherhood might be willing to overturn decades of core anti-Jewish and anti-Zionist ideology. But there's not even a glimmer of that in his column.

Tom Friedman

Where Israel is concerned, Friedman is equally off base, but not because of any similar refusal to endorse the warmer ties he insists are essential. Indeed, Friedman's failure to acknowledge the nearly complete rejection for over 30 years by a Mubarak-led Egypt of stronger ties with Israel is astonishing.

He ignores even the most basic facts. For instance, the 1979 Israel-Egypt peace agreement contained scores of articles concerning trade, tourism and cultural exchanges that would have resulted in the very people-to-people ties Friedman claims Israel avoided. Yet, it was Egypt that, with few exceptions, repeatedly stymied the implementation of these ties. Following Anwar Sadat's assassination in 1982 at the hands of radical Islamists, Mubarak was hardly anxious to inflame anti-Israel attitudes further by establishing even lukewarm ties with the Jewish state.

To mention just two examples among many: Israeli efforts to encourage academic exchanges were rebuffed by the Egyptian intelligentsia under the control, variously, of anti-Israel leftists, Nasserites, and the Muslim Brotherhood (who also dominated many professional guilds, such as the lawyers' and writers' associations). In those rare cases when Egyptian academics did participate in conferences in Israel, they were blacklisted back home. Likewise for Egyptian journalists who dared to meet with Israeli colleagues: they were expelled from the journalists' union upon returning to Cairo. The message was clear – deal with Israelis at your peril.

How could Friedman discount the huge number of Israelis who (until relatively recently) travelled, year after year, to Egypt (and well beyond merely the Sinai's Red Sea tourist spots)? In one year alone (1999), more than 400,000 Israelis visited Egypt, while only a tiny fraction of that number came to Israel from Egypt. Egyptians were discouraged from doing so.

Those who claim that Egypt could not forge better ties with Israel because of the "plight of the Palestinians," should remember that even in the heyday of the Oslo process when Israel and the Palestinians had entered a period of historic reconciliation, Egypt's attitude towards Israel remained bitterly cold.

Israeli academic Dan Eldar captured the crux of the disparity in these attitudes in an essay he wrote about a decade ago for the Middle East Quarterly: "While Israel has yearned for a real peace including normalization of all its relations with Egypt, to be followed by other Arab countries, Egypt has framed the peace with Israel in its narrowest possible interpretation. Egypt has assiduously amassed the fruits of peace, primarily U.S. aid on a large scale. But it has refused to see its diplomatic and cultural relations with Israel as a fruit of peace. Indeed, to the extent it must maintain such relations, it regards them as an embarrassment and a burden."

How pathetic, then, for Friedman to insist on a moral equivalence between Israeli and Egyptian responsibilities for advancing peace.

Couple's new gift advances palliative care at NYGH

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Zoltan and Yetta Freeman have pledged $1 million to establish the Freeman Centre for the Advancement of Palliative Care at North York General Hospital.

The pledge follows a donation the couple made to NYGH in 1999 that helped create the Freeman Centre for Palliative Care.

In a recent interview at the hospital, their daughter, Dr. Risa Freeman, a physician at NYGH since 1988, said her parents – her father came to Canada from Hungary after World War II and now owns Allan Candy – made their original donation because they wanted to give a meaningful gift to North York General.

"They asked what the hospital's needs were [and learned] that it was looking to start a unique palliative care program with an in-patient and out-patient component."

In a statement, the hospital said that thanks to the partnership between the Freemans and North York General, the centre has created a model for care that's both compassionate and innovative.

"The centre is a rare example of a palliative care program that provides services on a community outreach and an acute in-patient basis," the hospital said.

Within the hospital, the oncology unit has six dedicated short-term palliative suites, designed with a focus on pain and symptom management.

Since its founding, the Freeman Centre has provided end-of-life care to more than 1,000 patients.

Freeman family members in front of donor wall

The Freeman's recent pledge will help expand the reach of the centre's clinical care and augment its training and research capacity.

Yetta Freeman said that the family has "always been aware of the hospital's reputation for providing the most compassionate care. We were so pleased to help create such an innovative program to help patients at a difficult, vulnerable time."

Their daughter said that "as a compassionate society, we know that it's our responsibility to care for dying patients. That's why our partnership with [NYGH] to establish the Freeman Centre provided us with so much satisfaction.

"It's a privilege to know that people in their end stages of life receive great medical care that is compassionate and professional."

Dr. Nina Horvath, medical director, of the Freeman Centre, said palliative care is not just end-of-life care. "It's also for pain management and the comfort of patients with life-threatening illnesses."

A family physician, Horvath said that her interest in palliative care came about when she saw terminally ill patients being sent to emergency rooms and then being treated in acute care wards.

"I wanted to figure out how to provide them with the care they needed, rather than have them going though the ER."

Dr. Freeman said that she feels lucky to work in a place that embraces palliative care. "Being able to help patients and their families during this difficult journey is a privilege. It is a gift for us to get so close to people's lives."

Mother's blog raises awareness of little known condition

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Alana Vertlieb, 33, is spreading the word about her son, Spencer Kastner.

Just less than a year old, Spencer had a five-hour surgery at the Hospital for Sick Children last month to correct right coronal synostosis, a condition by which the bones in the skull fuse together prematurely.

The skull of an infant or young child is made up of bony plates that allow for growth of the skull. The borders at which these plates intersect are called sutures, and they normally close when the child is two or three years old. In some cases, one or more sutures may prematurely fuse shut.

On the side of the skull where the suture has closed, you can feel a raised ridge of bone, and when you look at a child who has coronal synostosis from above, you can see that the forehead is further back on that side. In looking straight on, one eye may seem bigger and the tip of the nose is slightly deviated toward the side of the fused suture.

In Spencer's case, one suture fused on the right side.

Vertlieb said that shortly after Spencer was born, she noticed one eye seemed bigger than the other. "I went to my doctor, and he was concerned it may be a compressed fracture. I pushed to get an X-ray, and the radiologist noticed what it was. I had never heard of this condition."

Vertlieb and her husband, Steven Kastner, a teacher, are anxious to create awareness of coronal synostosis, through Vertlieb's blog, (spencersstory2012.blogspot.ca).

In an interview the day before Spencer's surgery, Vertlieb, who has another son, Eidan, 4, said she is documenting her experience because when she searched online after Spencer was diagnosed, she found little useful information.

"There was a lot of scientific information, but few personal stories, and no pictures. My goal is to document our journey, so that when people search the condition online, our name will pop up.

"Not only is it therapeutic for me to write, but it must be making an impact because 60,000 people have read the blog."

She wants to be a support system for other parents going through this, "either now or years from now. I want to inform, discuss causes, treatment and share other patient stories.

"I will also document Spencer's story with pictures taken along this journey, including the months leading up to surgery, the surgery itself, recovery and healing."

Vertlieb is happy to report that Spencer has made a quick recovery. "You'd never know he had such major surgery. We are very thankful for the amazing team at Sick Kids."

Toronto rabbis weigh in on assisted suicide

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

A recent B.C. ruling declaring Canada's laws against physician-assisted suicide unconstitutional has stirred debate across the country. Some Toronto rabbis recently shared their views about this with The CJN.

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner (Orthodox), rosh beit midrash, Yeshiva University-Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov in Toronto:

From the perspective of Orthodoxy, we absolutely oppose the idea of taking one's own life. That doesn't mean that we have no mercy for the person who is suffering. In a case like this, [Gloria Taylor], a woman with ALS, it's grotesque to say she's going to have to suffer without mitigation – but there is mitigation to offer.

The main issue is the question of whether one has the right to take a life. The reason behind the ruling in British Columbia was that suicide is not illegal in secular law. Therefore, for people who are not incapacitated, allowing a physician to assist is levelling the playing field, so that they can do what everybody else can do.

The fundamental disagreement I'm going to have is that, from a Jewish perspective, suicide is "illegal," so to speak. We don't punish someone who tries to commit suicide, not because we condone the act, but because you can't punish someone who is crying out for help.

We would want to use every mechanism available medically to remove pain and to mitigate suffering. That's obligatory. But it's not as simple as opening up a textbook and saying, "You are permitted to do this, you are not permitted to do that." Fundamentally, this is a human issue; it's not a legal issue.

A person in this horrific circumstance must be addressed with all of the love and care and support that the community can muster, in the same way that when someone does commit suicide, the approach within the Orthodox community is to understand that this person was acting out of pain. Certainly, you're not going to criminalize them, not going to condemn them. We pray that cures for this and other diseases like this will be found.

Rabbi Michael Stroh (Reform), rabbi emeritus, Temple Har Zion, and author, Martyrdom: Suicide for the Sake of Heaven (forthcoming):

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner

Rabbi Michael Stroh

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

There are two kinds of suicide in Jewish law – passive and active. In one, you're letting nature take its course, like pulling the plug. Under the right circumstances, that's okay in Judaism. Then there's active euthanasia: if you leave nature alone, the person will live; therefore, you have to actively bring about that person's death. For the most part, Judaism is against that.

Not everything that is legal is moral. People don't own their bodies – they can't do anything to their body that they want to. Legalization of physician-assisted suicide opens the door to all kinds of things.

You begin to develop a "death-mindedness." In countries that have approved physician-assisted suicide, there are people who haven't expressed that wish, but a panel determines that if they could speak they would. Elderly people carry a slip of paper: "To a physician, please don't kill me."

The proposal here is that a panel would decide whether you're competent to decide. But on what basis could the law say a person isn't in enough pain? Teenagers who commit suicide are in a lot of pain, but not usually physical pain.

Every person's life has infinite worth. Once you enter into that discussion, where do you draw that line? Someone who is disabled is as much a human being, and entitled to as much medical care.

But there is also a Jewish principle of l'chatchila and b'diavad: before something is done, it's prohibited, but after it's done, you might look at it differently. The Talmud tells of Rabbi Chanina ben Tradyon, one of 10 famous martyrs to the Romans. As he was being burnt at the stake, they applied damp wool to him so the fire would burn more slowly and he would have more pain.

His executioner asked, "Rabbi, if I raise the flame and take away the wool… will you cause me to enter into the life to come?"

He replied, "Yes."

The executioner did so, leapt into the fire, and both died. A bat kol (heavenly voice) announced, "Rabbi Chanina and the executioner have been assigned to the world to come."

What this is is the story of an assisted suicide under extreme circumstances, to stop somebody's unbearable pain, and it's praiseworthy. There's an expression, "Hard cases make bad law." It's not that, in the Jewish tradition, suicide is never acceptable (it usually appears in stories, not in law). But, nonetheless, I would say this should not be generalized into a law.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl (Conservative), senior rabbi, Beth Tzedec Congregation:

Judaism looks at each individual life as significant and sacred. We are bequeathed our bodies from our parents and from God. We have an obligation to care for them as best as we can throughout our lives.

We don't have authorization to terminate life, and we do have an obligation to try as much as possible to protect and preserve life, and in particular, to protect the most vulnerable.

Many times, people who are facing very serious illnesses are very frail. What they primarily need is care, support and love. Physicians [must not become] in any way suspect about their primary obligation being to preserve and protect and enhance the life of the patient.

The most problematic aspect [of the B.C. decision] is the idea that an individual can request, even under a lot of criteria, assistance in self-destruction. This is very different from what we would call non-action: that is, "I don't want to be treated," through a passive act of omission: not eating, not treating. This is an act of commission – something that's being done in a very strong, assertive and positive way.

We're not in a position to actually determine what makes a life valuable. And once an individual can decide for him or herself, maybe someone who has court authority over someone can decide for that person. We also open the possibility up for other actions that may negatively affect vulnerable people.

I'd recommend David Novak's book, The Sanctity of Human Life. He's probably the leading Canadian Jewish thinker on the subject, and he's also a rabbi. His book is a major statement of Jewish ethics and principles, as is Elliot Dorff's Matters of Life and Death. While, in some areas, these two great rabbis may differ, they are clearly against physician-assisted suicide.

It behooves rabbis and educators to teach about how important the sanctity of life is. We say God is the life of the universe; when we toast, we say "l'chaim," to life. We have to continually place an emphasis on choosing life. Now, there are times we say "a time to live and a time to die." But always, I would say our primary emphasis is on choosing life, as long as we have the breath of life in us.

Reena in the News

Reena

There was great excitement at Reena's Annual General Meeting in June, as David Zimmer, MPP for Willowdale, presented a very special award to Sandy Keshen, Reena's President and CEO. He explained the detailed protocol to the large audience which stated that the award was being made " On Command of Her Royal Highness, Queen Elizabeth 11" as he presented Sandy with the Queen Elizabeth 11 Diamond Jubilee Medal for her ongoing and outstanding contribution to the betterment of life for people with a developmental disability.

A roar of approval and excitement came from everyone present as Mr. Zimmer pinned the medal on the left lapel of Sandy's jacket (another protocol) and handed her a small pin to be worn on less formal occasions.

Mr. Zimmer has been a long-time friend and staunch supporter of Reena for many years and he expressed his deep personal admiration and appreciation of Sandy's role in the growth and importance that Reena has achieved since its inception. Also present at the meeting was Monte Kwinter, MPP for York Centre, as well as many supporters, families, staff, and individuals with a developmenta disability whom Reena supports.

Mazeltov and congratulations, Sandy. We are all delighted that you have been acknowledged in this meaningful way.

Assisted suicide - what does it mean?

Dr. Larry Librach, director of the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care at Mt. Sinai Hospital, says physician-assisted suicide means both "a request from a patient with advanced progressive illness and intractable suffering who wants the opportunity to end their lives before the disease does," and "a physician or somebody [giving] them medication: they could take the medication and then die because of taking the medication."

Where it's currently legal, Librach says, a patient or volunteer usually administers the medication him or herself. Euthanasia, on the other hand, "is when a physician actively injects a patient with a medication that will basically end their lives within minutes." There's also a misconception that "when you withdraw or withhold treatments, hydration or fluids or food, that that is assisted suicide – it's not."

Palliative care can "look after patients and provide them with quality end-of-life care as best we can. Most people are satisfied… but we cannot relieve all suffering. Despite the best palliative care, there will still be patients who request assisted suicide. The two are not mutually exclusive." He also rejects the "slippery slope." "As Jews we're always worried about… what happened in Nazi Germany, but… I have greater faith in Canadian society. If you look at places like Oregon and Washington, they've managed to introduce legislation that's been very protective." - JMM

The best of Syrian Jewish food from Aleppo

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Aleppo, a city in northwest Syria lying astride major Middle East trade routes, was settled by Jews in waves of immigration starting during antiquity. In the 15th century, following the Spanish Inquisition, yet more Jews arrived in Aleppo. By the turn of the 19th century, Aleppo was a thriving Jewish centre.

The Jews of Aleppo, influenced by Mediterranean and Levantine gastronomic traditions, developed a wonderful cuisine based on bountiful local products including grains, legumes, vegetables and herbs.

If you were fortunate enough to have been invited to a Jewish home in Aleppo, you were plied with a succession of delicacies. These dishes might include mujedrah (rice with brown lentils and caramelized onions), keftes (tamarind-stewed meatballs), s'fiha (stuffed baby eggplants with ground meat and rice) and spanekh b'jib (spinach cheese frittata).

These days, Aleppian Jewish food is rarely, if ever, found in Syria. After the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan, Aleppo was the scene of a pogrom that prompted Jews to leave Syria. Today, for the first time in 2,000 years, not a single known Jew lives in Aleppo.

Despite these developments, Aleppian Jewish culinary traditions are lovingly maintained in a host of countries where Syrian Jews have resettled.

One such place is Deal, N.J., where Poopa Dweck – an expert in Aleppian Jewish cookery and a first-generation Syrian Jewish American – resides with her family.

As a gift to her children and community, Dweck has co-written a first-class book, Aromas of Aleppo: The Legendary Cuisine of Syrian Jews, published by HarperCollins. The co-author, Michael Cohen, is an attorney and food writer.

Lavishly illustrated with atmospheric vintage photographs of 19th-century Jewish residents, Aromas of Aleppo is chockfull of great recipes that are easy to follow.

Appetizers run the gamut from eggplant sesame puree to lemon-infused allspice cumin potato salad. Mains include baked bulgur ground meat pie and spicy grilled meat kabobs.

Dairy dishes range from parsley and onion fritters to scrambled eggs with rhubarb.

There are recipes galore for rice, grains and pasta: classic Aleppian rice, rice and fava beans with garlic, buttery noodles with cheese ravioli and bulgur with cheese.

Soups have a definite place in this sumptuous volume: noodles and lentil soup, chilled yogurt and cucumber soup and red lentil soup flavoured with garlic and coriander.

The sweets look tantalizing. How about stuffed Syrian pancakes? Pudding with rose water and nuts? Semolina pudding drizzled with butter? Or ricotta-filled shredded wheat pastry?

Aromas of Aleppo is a beautifully crafted, well-written book that preserves for posterity the rich legacy of Syrian Jewish cooking and baking.

Israeli consul general visits Camp Kadimah

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

BARSS CORNER, N.S. — The black RCMP-driven SUV rolled into the Camp Kadimah parking lot and out stepped a man relaxed after a busy day and a half meeting politicians and community folk in Prince Edward Island and Halifax.

As he looked around the 68-year-old camp on the shores of Lake William in Barss Corner, Joel Lion, Israel's consul general to Quebec and the Atlantic Provinces, smiled.

He was recalling happy days spent at Camp Akiva in France, where he enjoyed his childhood. At Kadimah, he saw excited campers and staff trooping to the dining hall where they would soon scarf down falafel pitas.

In a brief address to more than 250 listeners, Lion said, "While I'm glad to see you here on Israel Day, every day is Israel Day for me."

Israel Day was a special camp day of festivities, emphasizing more Israeli programming than usual, including a swim where campers were asked to imagine a Tel Aviv beach, and an Israeli carnival with games and goodies.

"You should be proud to be part of the Jewish nation," Lion said. "We are not there to make wars but to achieve peace with our neighbours, with all nations."

He noted that in 1948, when the State of Israel was born, there was one big river (the Jordan) and two lakes, one of which, he said, "was dead, the Dead Sea, and another on life support. We didn't have lots to begin with, but in 65 years, we went from nothing to become one of the 33 most prosperous nations in the world."

He talked briefly about Israel's accomplishments in medicine and technology and stressed that "the best way to tell others about us is to talk of our achievements."

He later met with several campers and staff from Israel who were attending the camp under the auspices of the Atlantic Jewish Council and private donations. He participated in Israel Day before reluctantly drawing away.

Joel Lion speaks to staff and campers at Camp Kadimah earlier this month. [Joel Jacobson photo]

The day before, Lion met with Prince Edward Island Premier Robert Ghiz, Charlottetown Mayor Clifford Lee and University of Prince Edward Island president Alaa Abd-El-Aziz. Lion was also "elected" to the P.E.I. Jewish community at a social event.

The morning of his camp visit, he met Halifax Mayor Peter Kelly. "We have strong relations with Nova Scotia," Lion said, recalling a meeting with Premier Darrel Dexter last fall prior to a successful Nova Scotia trade mission to Israel, headed by Dexter.

Mount Royal reconfiguration

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler said he would rally constituents and even consider going to court to prevent historic Mount Royal riding from being "dismembered."

Under proposals revealed July 16 by the independent Federal Elections Boundaries Commission, the 88-year-old riding and Liberal bastion represented for 19 years by Pierre Elliott Trudeau would be renamed John-Peters-Humphrey, in honour of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights author.

But the new riding would lose an important part of the Cote des Neiges district east of Victoria Avenue that includes the Jewish General Hospital and Cotler's own riding office, also the office for 15 years of his predecessor, the late Sheila Finestone.

Vancouverite finds meaningful travel in Habitat for Humanity

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — For most of us, vacation means taking it easy. But when Vancouverite Jill Goldberg went to Fiji for two weeks in May, she was ready for some hard work – the kind that requires a hammer, calls for early mornings on a construction site and involves building houses.

A 38-year-old English literature professor at Langara College, Goldberg had joined Habitat for Humanity for a two-week excursion to Lautoka, an industrial Fijian city, "with dusty streets, peeling paint, shabby exteriors and no sparkling beach to be found," she said.

Goldberg and her team were tasked with helping to build houses in the community of Koroipita, home to some of Fiji's most destitute citizens.

"The work was hard," she recalled. "We were doing wood framing, but there was no nail gun, so that meant that every last nail was driven in by hand. I went to sleep each night with the sound of hammering ringing in my ears, yet I woke each morning eager to start again."

Goldberg wanted to form a deeper connection with local people than she had during previous trips as a tourist. "When I was in Bali, it was so lovely, but I was so aware of the equality imbalance between me and the people who lived there. I wanted to get past the tourist scenario, and I really wanted to help. I thought, if I can go someplace and contribute something other than sitting around in a hotel, I might feel like I've done something useful," she said of her decision to join the Habitat group.

The prospect of running around a worksite with a hammer was appealing to her, and watching two homes erected over the course of her stay in Fiji was very gratifying, she said. She and her team were on site by 8:15 a.m., unloading trucks of lumber and sweating beneath the Fijian sun until 4 p.m.

Her trip came at a cost of $1,800, which went toward covering her meals and accommodation, as well as toward building materials and salaries for the construction workers.

"I loved that the usual relationship between traveller and local was, even just for moments, reversed," she said. "I also loved that we got to eat food cooked in Koroipita and not in some fancy hotel, that we cleaned our own table at lunchtime, helping out those who made us food and snacks. Over the time there, we learned ways to befriend the Fijian workers that let us on their building site and showed us such endearing hospitality. That type of cultural exchange goes a long way toward breaking down stereotypes."

It was Goldberg's second Habitat for Humanity trip – the first one was in Hawaii two years ago – and its effect has been profound, she said.

"In Fiji, the poverty was much more evident and pervasive. Some of the Fijian people we worked with would show up on the worksite without shoes, for example, and this made me reflect on what it means to have so little that certain basic things, things pertaining to safety and health, are unattainable.

"It reinforced the feeling that participating in a Habitat build let me see not the glossy Fiji of travel brochures, but the difficulties of Fijian life as it is for many of its inhabitants. Of course, this made working on homes for people who don't have a home all the more profound."

Goldberg is planning to become a team leader for future trips, with Africa next on her list.

"This trip reminded me that, no matter my own skepticism about the West's efforts to do good, there are moments, opportunities and places that do enable significant work to be done – whether in the form of hammering nails or in the form of a cultural exchange – that, even just for a moment, reverses or equalizes the usual power dynamics that exist."

Hamilton Jewish Federation's CEO retires

Abigail Cukier
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — It was an antisemitic slur that helped Gerald Fisher find his path in life.

While studying for his master's degree in social work at Dalhousie University, a friend who didn't realize Fisher was Jewish made an antisemitic statement.

"It flipped me right out," Fisher said.

The next day, he looked in the Yellow Pages under "J," called the local Jewish organization and asked to volunteer.

That was 1974.

At the end of July, Fisher will have devoted 38 years to serving Jewish communities in Canada and the United States. He's now retiring from his post as CEO of the Hamilton Jewish Federation.

Born in Boston, Fisher moved to Nova Scotia at age 22. When he made that first phone call, the man on the other end of the line asked him to pick up a distinguished speaker from the airport and "schlep" the speaker around to his engagements.

Fisher continued to volunteer and, as an intern as part of his master's studies, he helped create the Atlantic Jewish Council.

Gerald Fisher

In 1976, Fisher went to Brandeis University in Massachusetts to get another master's degree, this time in contemporary Jewish studies.

His first job was as a community planning associate with the Toronto Jewish Congress in 1977. After that, he was executive director of the B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation of Metropolitan Toronto for four years.

In 1983, he became first national director of community services for the Canada-Israel Committee. Between 1984 and 1999, Fisher worked for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto as director of administrative services, senior planning associate and director of human resources and community development.

From 1999 to 2001, Fisher served as executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Manchester in New Hampshire, a position that allowed him to act as caregiver for his mother.

In 2001, Fisher moved to Hamilton.

"I had the insight of being part of a smaller Jewish community from my time in Nova Scotia. I would have never left Toronto otherwise," he said. "A smaller community has its own challenges and its own rewards. There is no hiding in the bureaucracy in a small community. You are more engaged.

"In Toronto, I was in the corner office. You don't see what is going on, you don't see the successes."

Fisher is concerned that Hamilton's Jewish population, which numbers about 4,700, is not growing larger, but growing older. He hopes the community will be able to sustain itself financially for necessary services.

"We have had some success attracting young families. We are working with McMaster University and the City of Hamilton," he said.

While Fisher says he loves Hamilton's Jewish community, a health scare prompted his decision to retire.

"I love this job, but I am busy all of the time. It can be very stressful. I have recovered and I am feeling good. I want to enjoy it," he said.

"My wife and I will remain in Hamilton and be a part of the community. We really enjoy it here."

Fisher, 63, said if he waited to retire until his current contract ends, it would be at the same time as the term of the executive committee ends.

"I have enormous respect for this Jewish community. I care about what's going to happen, and from a strategic perspective, the current executive committee is a volunteer group of enormous competence," he said. "I believe it is in the community's interest that this executive committee make the decision about who will replace me."

Larry Szpirglas, president of the Hamilton Jewish Federation, said the search is on to find Fisher's successor.

"Whoever we find will have inherited a stable foundation to work from and staff that is energized and ready to help," Szpirglas said.

Not that he thinks Fisher will be easy to replace.

"Gerry is a consummate professional. He helped us re-energize our work in public advocacy and strengthened our link to the general community," he said.

"He also built up our campaign and has shown us the value of how year-round education and information sharing supports fundraising.

"It's easy to say nice things about Gerry."

As for what's next, Fisher plans to spend some time in Israel with his wife of 15 years, Anna-Rae Fishman. They will also continue to raise Leonberger puppies and possibly enter the show ring.

"I am grateful for the opportunity to have served the Hamilton community," Fisher said. "I believe we are stronger and more coherent. I believe we've accomplished a lot together."

פתח תקווה

Suicide bomber's accomplices may still be in Bulgaria

JTA

An accomplice of the suicide bomber who killed six on an Israeli tour bus in Burgas, Bulgaria, reportedly is likely to still be in the country, possibly with another bomb.

The accomplice is believed to have been a backup for the suicide bomber, the Novinite.com website reported. Another accomplice was set to shoot the other two if they were captured by or turned themselves in to police, and both reportedly were at the airport during the July 18 attack.

Bulgarian police are continuing their search for the accomplices.

The suicide bomber, who was dressed like an American tourist and carried a fake Michigan driver's licence, has not yet officially been identified, though he is reported to be a Swedish Muslim who spent time at Guantanamo Bay.

Bulgarian media reported that eyewitnesses to the attack described two distinct people when asked to describe the bomber, leading to the theory that the bomber had backup. The second attacker may be an American named David Jefferson, according to reports.

An unknown group calling itself Qaedat al-Jihad has claimed responsibility for the attack, but the Belgian foreign ministry has denied the claim, saying that the Iranian-backed Hezbollah perpetrated the attack – a claim backed up by the United States and Israel.

"Our people are working around the clock with their Bulgarian counterparts, as well as with other leading intelligence services from around the world," Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said Sunday morning. "In the meantime, it is clear that the terror attack was directed by Hezbollah. It is clear that at least one other person was involved, maybe more, whose identity is not Middle Eastern; probably intentionally. All other additional details remain unclear."

He added, "There is no doubt that we are facing a global terror campaign, against Israel in particular, with Hezbollah at its centre, inspired by Iran. Unfortunately, however, there are many other players."

> 'It is clear that the terror attack was directed by Hezbollah'

The five Israelis who were killed in the terrorist attack were buried in Israel.

Funerals were held last Friday for Maor Harush, 25; Itzik Kolengi, 28; Amir Menashe, 28; Elior Priess, 26, and Kochava Shriki, 44, who was pregnant with her first child.

Seventeen injured Israelis are still hospitalized across the country after being flown back to Israel by the Israel Defence Forces on Thursday, according to Ynet. Two of the injured remain seriously wounded, according to the news service.

Yair Maman, Kolengi's brother-in-law, said at the funeral, "I cannot believe we are saying goodbye to you. The extent of the horror is indescribable – you went for a vacation and came back in a coffin," Ynet reported.

Menashe's wife, Natalie, also was injured in the attack. She arrived at the funeral in a wheelchair and kept saying, "Come back to me. I can't live without you," according to Ynet.

Shriki's husband, Yitzhak, who was injured in the attack, searched for his wife for hours after being separated from her in the blast.

"Only when I arrived in Israel did I realize she was killed," he told Ynet. "I was told the prime minister wanted to console us, and that's how I realized she didn't survive."

Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA, Canadian Jewish Federations and the Jewish Agency for Israel last week reminded Canadians that anyone wishing to help provide financial assistance to the survivors and families of the victims of the attack could make a donation to the Victims of Terror fund.

The funding tool, operated by the Jewish Agency since 2002, exists to send monetary aid to Jews and Israelis affected by terrorist attacks anywhere in the world.

"Our thoughts are with the victims and their families in their time of need," Marc Gold, chair of Jewish Federations of Canada - UIA board of directors said in a statement. "The support offered through the Victims of Terror Fund will provide assistance and comfort to those whose lives have been devastated because of this terror attack."

Geisel was outraged by the news from France

Over the next two days, more than 13,000 Jews were rounded up in Paris by the Germans, with the active collaboration of the Vichy French government headed by Nazi supporter Pierre Laval. The majority of those arrested were couples with children. They were held for five excruciating days in the Vélodrome d'Hiver, a big arena used for bicycle races, in the summer heat, without food or water. Eyewitnesses described it as "a scene from hell." Then they were deported by train to the gas chambers of Auschwitz.

The brutal details of the roundup process were reported in the American press. The New York Times described the "scenes of terror and despair" in the streets of Paris, including suicides, Jewish patients dragged violently from hospital beds and children violently separated from their parents. Unfortunately, the article was relegated to page 16.

Geisel, who drew editorial cartoons for New York's PM Magazine under the pen name "Dr. Seuss," was outraged by the news from France and decided to use his cartooning skills to help publicize the plight of the Jews.

The future creator of such beloved classics as The Cat in the Hat and Green Eggs and Ham used stark and disturbing imagery in his July 20 cartoon. He drew a forest filled with corpses hanging from the trees, with a sign reading "Jew" pinned to each body. Adolf Hitler, with extra rope draped on his arm, and Vichy leader Pierre Laval were shown singing happily.

The first words of the Hitler-Laval song, "Only God can make a tree," were taken from Trees, a famous Alfred Joyce Kilmer poem about the unique and eternal beauty of trees. The second line, however, "To furnish sport for you and me," was a lyric concocted by Hitler and Laval to celebrate their "sport" of mass murder.

In one important respect, Dr. Seuss' cartoon was prescient: unlike many of his contemporaries, he correctly perceived that France's Jews were doomed to be killed. At the time of the roundups, the Germans claimed the Jews were being sent for "work in the east," and the deportees' true destination was generally unknown abroad.

One senior U.S. diplomat in France, S. Pinkney Tuck, urged the Roosevelt administration to take in 4,000 Jewish children who had been separated from their parents, on the grounds that they should be regarded as orphans, since the Nazis would not let their parents survive. But State Department officials complained that Tuck was exceeding his authority, and Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles assured American Jewish Congress leader Rabbi Stephen S. Wise that the deportees were just being relocated for "war work."

On July 20, 1942, Theodor Geisel, known as Dr. Seuss, drew a forest filled with corpses hanging from the trees, with a sign reading "Jew" pinned to each body. Adolf Hitler, with extra rope draped on his arm, and Vichy leader Pierre Laval were shown singing happily.

Dr. Seuss drew many anti-Nazi cartoons during his years at PM, but for reasons that are unclear, he never returned to the subject of Hitler's Jewish victims.

The dangers of fascism seem to have haunted him for many years to follow, however. Reworking a scene of a tower of turtles from one of his 1942 cartoons, he used the framework of what was ostensibly a child's fable to inveigh against totalitarianism in his 1958 bestseller Yertle the Turtle and Other Stories. Yertle is the king of a turtle pond who exploits his fellow turtles in order to increase his power and personal glory. Furious when he realizes the moon is higher than he is, Yertle commands his subjects to form themselves into a tower so that he can stand on them and reach the sky.

Dr. Seuss said later that Yertle was meant to symbolize Hitler, and the story was a warning against fascism.

Warsaw Ghetto liquidation remembered

JTA

WARSAW — A ceremony commemorating the liquidation of the Warsaw Ghetto was held in the city for the first time.

Sunday's ceremony marked the 70th anniversary of the day that the Germans began mass deportations of Jews to Treblinka, on July 22, 1942. More than 250,000 people were deported to the Nazi death camp.

Israel's deputy minister of education, Menachem Eliezer Mozes, at the ceremony quoted excerpts from the diary of Hillel Seidman, who wrote about the underground yeshivas and the involvement of Orthodox Jews in armed resistance in the ghetto.

Pawel Spiewak of the city's Jewish Historical Institute said that children were the greatest victims of the Holocaust.

"Only 500 children survived in Warsaw after the 'Great Action,'" he said

A prayer for the victims of the terrorist attack in Burgas, Bulgaria, was held earlier Sunday in the city's Nozyk synagogue. Later, a march of remembrance passed through the streets of Warsaw. Several hundred people from Poland and Israel walked on the road opposite the one that Janusz Korczak went with the children from his orphanage instead of saving himself from certain death. From Umschlagplatz, the site of the deportation, the marchers continued to the site of Korczak's orphanage.

At the end of the march, Rabbi Michael Schudrich, the chief rabbi of Poland, said that "We are not the same people we were an hour ago. We have this march of remembrance, march for life, and we must remember not the perpetrators but the victims."

Swiss hospitals suspend circumcisions

Ofer Aderet
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ZURICH — Two Swiss hospitals announced last week that they would temporarily stop performing circumcisions.

The announcements followed a recent ruling by a German court that the ritual is illegal, which sparked outrage among the Jewish and Muslim communities living in the country.

Last week, the Zurich children's hospital announced that it was temporarily halting circumcision operations. "We are in the process of evaluating the legal and ethical stance in Switzerland," said hospital spokesperson Marco Stuecheli.

"There can be complicated cases where the mother of a child wants a circumcision but the father is opposed to it," he added. The hospital said it performs only one or two such operations a month.

Meanwhile, another children's hospital, in the city of St. Gallen in northeastern Switzerland, has also decided to reassess its circumcision policy.

A senior hospital administrator told the local media that a decision on the matter would be reached after the summer vacation. The German government plans to submit a bill to parliament that would regulate circumcision and protect doctors who perform them from lawsuits.

Also last week, the German parliament passed a resolution endorsing the right of Muslim and Jewish parents to have their sons circumcised and urging the government to pass legislation on the matter.

Leading Rabbi dies at 102

JTA

JERUSALEM – Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv, the leader of the Lithuanian haredi Orthodox community and considered this generation's leading halachic authority, died last week in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Elyashiv, who had been hospitalized and on a respirator due to complications from congestive heart failure, was 102.

Rabbi Elyashiv became leader of the community in the years before the 2001 death of Rabbi Elazar Menachem Man Shach when Rabbi Shach was no longer able to function.

Unlike Rabbi Shach – a fiery speaker and an innovative leader who was instrumental in establishing the daily newspaper Yated Neeman, as well as Degel Hatorah, a political party that represents the interests of non-chassidic haredim in the Knesset – Rabbi Elyashiv shunned social contact and communal endeavours.

He spent nearly every waking moment studying rabbinical literature and making rulings in the field of Jewish law. Rabbi Elyashiv's rulings on Jewish law reflect a deeply conservative, stringent approach.

Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv

Rabbi Elyashiv prohibited haredi institutions from receiving charity from Christians; he ruled that it was forbidden to use elevators on Shabbat, including those preprogrammed to work automatically; and he took a stringent position on the halachic definition of death, making it nearly impossible for Jews to donate organs.

In 2005, Rabbi Elyashiv ruled in favour of joining Ariel Sharon's government, providing it with essential backing ahead of the withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and the evacuation of 8,500 Jewish settlers living there.

In exchange, Rabbi Elyashiv demanded an immediate halt to all attempts to limit the complete educational autonomy of haredi educational institutions, including those partially funded by the state.

Born in 1910, Rabbi Elyashiv moved to Palestine when he was 14 years old and later became close to the established Jerusalem rabbinate. Following his service on the High Rabbinical Court, he distanced himself from the established Zionist rabbinate and became a leader of the haredi Orthodox establishment.

He and his wife, Sheina Chaya, who died in 1994 and was a daughter of prominent Rabbi Aryeh Levin, had 12 children. Three years ago, one of Rabbi Elyashiv's great-grandchildren became a grandfather.

"In his rulings, Rabbi Elyashiv made a deep impression on the ultra-orthodox world and on the entire Jewish People. In his teachings, he outlined a path for many, who drew their strength from his wisdom and his sharp thinking. Rabbi Elyashiv's way was to love the Torah and humanity, to be self-effacing and to maintain the sanctity of life," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a statement.

"Today, the Jewish People have lost a sharp and incisive rabbi, a wise man of great stature, an emissary who was faithful to the values of the Torah and who gave to others. We mourn his passing."

Peres cancels Olympics participation

Israeli President Shimon Peres cancelled his participation in the 2012 Olympic Games in London after failing to find a way to attend the opening ceremony without desecrating the Jewish Sabbath. The opening ceremony begins on a Friday, July 27, before Shabbat starts, but will end well after the onset of the holy day. Though Peres is not religiously observant, he does not publicly desecrate Shabbat.

Panel: Judea Samaria not occupied

A report by the commission to examine the status of building in Judea and Samaria – a legal panel headed by retired Israeli Supreme Court Justice Edmund Levy – concluded that according to international law, the classical definition of "occupation" cannot be applied to Israel's presence in the area. The Levy Committee, formed in January, explained that no other legal entity, including Jordan, "has ever had its sovereignty over [Judea and Samaria] cemented under international law." There is also no provision making the Jewish population in the area illegal under international law, and Israelis "have the legal right to settle in Judea and Samaria and the establishment of settlements cannot, in and of itself, be considered to be illegal," the report reads.

Moguls plan new Israeli media

U.S. billionaire Ronald Lauder and French millionaire Patrick Drahi are following in the footsteps of U.S. casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, who is already publishing an English edition of his Israeli daily newspaper Israel Hayom, by extending their Israeli media companies to an international audience. Lauder, a co-owner of Israel's Channel 10, is buying the Hebrew news website Nana 10 and intends to transform it into an English-language site that will appeal to readers outside of Israel. Drahi, a shareholder of Israel's HOT cable television company, announced plans to launch an international TV station covering the Middle East from an Israeli perspective.

Downtown café caters to parents with young kids

Samantha Stroh
Special to The CJN

When parents are looking for a great place to take their kids, they usually have to choose who is going to have the fun – themselves or the kids.

Tera Goldblatt came up with an idea to satisfy both kids and parents while at the same time, cornering a potentially profitable market.

Along with her partner, Davina Cheung-Brown, Goldblatt opened Playful Grounds, an elegant "café/restaurant that is kid friendly" in Toronto at 605 College St.

It's a carefully chosen location because of its proximity to the College Montrose Children's Place, the drop-in centre where Goldblatt and Cheung-Brown first connected and came up with their brainchild.

Goldblatt is banking on differentiating Playful Grounds from other restaurants or cafés that double as indoor play gyms.

"Playful Grounds isn't for the kids; it's for the parents," she said, adding that she understands how much parents need a place for themselves.

"We're our own market. We know how wonderful it feels to just sit down and have a cup of coffee. And when your kid wakes up from a nap and starts screaming, you won't wish you were anywhere else."

Every new business faces some healthy competition, but Playful Grounds is unique.

"Other independently-owned cafés might have stairs or lack the stroller space, and play gyms aren't restaurants so it depends on how our audience views us. But we see ourselves as a really good restaurant that provides parents with a place to relax [with their kids]," Goldblatt said.

Playful Grounds also sets itself apart from other kid-friendly spots because they don't charge a fee for their play area.

"We don't want people to pay for their kids to play. We want an affordable way for parents to eat, meet people and spend time interacting with their kids in a warm, safe environment," she said.

With seating capacity for 30, the café includes a large open area for numerous strollers, runaway toddlers and a small but interactive play area. A large train table, books, a play kitchen plus a lot of other toys entertain kids up to age five, so parents can enjoy rare moments of uninterrupted conversation, coffee and good food.

Playful Grounds offers an ever-changing menu that caters to both adults and children.

Being a mom herself, Goldblatt knows parents are always looking for resources to make their lives easier.

"We offer workshops in financial planning for your child's future, child care options, infant massage, baby sign language, getting your body back with baby, Dr. Sears workshops, mental health postpartum, secondary infertility and how to maintain your [marriage] postpartum," she said.

These have proven a hit with parents and all are free of charge.

So, with all of the free perks, does Goldblatt make any money? With loans from the Canadian Youth Business Foundation, Business Development Corporation, Jewish Free Loan Toronto and generous family members, more than $100,000 was raised to open Playful Grounds.

In only four months since opening, "we pay our bills and rent every month, food costs and hundreds [of dollars] in loans. We even managed to pay ourselves once," Goldblatt boasted.

By offering affordable kids' parties, Goldblatt and Cheung-Brown hope the next six months will be more lucrative.

"Parties will be where the profit will come from," Goldblatt said.

In addition to kids' birthday parties, "we also focus on working with corporate events. We can do book and magazine launches, adult parties, like birthdays, weddings and baby showers and corporate catering."

Goldblatt admits there are challenges to opening a new business.

"Cash flow is an issue," she said.

And she expects business to slow down during the summer months.

"Our original business plan accounted for summer being slower because more parents are in the park," she said.

They're trying to address that by offering a "picnic in the park" takeout menu. They've obtained a liquor license for their patio, which seats eight, and Goldblatt hopes that will encourage parents to stop by later in the day.

Currently, Goldblatt and Cheung-Brown single-handedly do it all – the ordering, cooking, organizing, and maintaining their website.

Eventually, they would like to hire staff and delegate the responsibilities, but for now, "we share a brain and naturally do the stuff we're best at. Davina does the financial work, and I do the blogging and marketing."

Goldblatt believes they're onto something big. Parents are desperate for adult conversation and a community of like-minded people. Apparently, their clientele agrees.

"People thank us every day, and we're so happy to make parents' lives easier," she said.

Woman faces three-trillion-shekel fine

Rachel Sayag Sofer, a businesswoman facing a three-trillion-shekel claim ($758 billion, all figures US) by a former employee, is finally getting her day in court. National Labour Court Judge Varda Wirth Livne sent the file back to the regional labour court to deal with the merits of the case that goes back to 2001, when an arbitrator ruled that Sayag Sofer pay Jonathan Zabary, who worked for her just seven months, 310,000 shekels ($78,315) in severance.

Sayag Sofer filed an appeal with the Jerusalem Regional Labour Court, claiming the arbitrator wasn't impartial, but the court insisted she post a 150,000-shekel bond ($38,000). The employment contract had included a provision for a 20 per cent monthly late-payment penalty, so as the case dragged on the debt ballooned to more than three trillion shekels. Meanwhile, labour courts repeatedly rebuffed her, based on her not having put up the original bond.

Israeli startup taps computer hacker

Computer hacker Kevin Mitnick has been named a director of Israeli startup Zimperium, a computer network security company. Mitnick was convicted in 1999 of four counts of fraud, two counts of computer fraud and one count of wiretapping. He was also alleged to have broken into computer networks of the U.S. federal government and Pacific Bell. He now heads his own computer security consulting firm that advises companies on defending against hacker attacks.

Zimperium has developed an application called ANTI – Android Network Toolkit – which provides information on system penetration from devices accessing nearby Wi-Fi networks.

Bank of Israel predicts expansion

The Bank of Israel's S index, which measures the state of the economy, rose a preliminary 0.2 per cent in June, pointing to expanding economic activity even as economic growth stabilized in the second quarter. The index showed growth in commerce and services (0.8 per cent for May), and smaller gains for industrial production (0.1 per cent) and exports of services (0.3 per cent). These increases were offset by a sharp drop in merchandise exports and in imports of consumer goods and industrial inputs. The index has risen about 0.2 per cent in each of the previous three months, but it noted that the pace of the gains was smaller than it was in 2011.

New novel sets story in small-town Canada

If you have time on your hands, or are in the book reviewing business, take a look at the range of responses available online to Richard Ford's remarkable new novel, Canada (Harper Collins).

Some focus on it as a story of a family's collapse, others attend to the sparseness and poetry of Ford's language, while still others concern themselves with the author's view of the contemporary American psyche or the qualities of small town life in far-flung Montana.

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

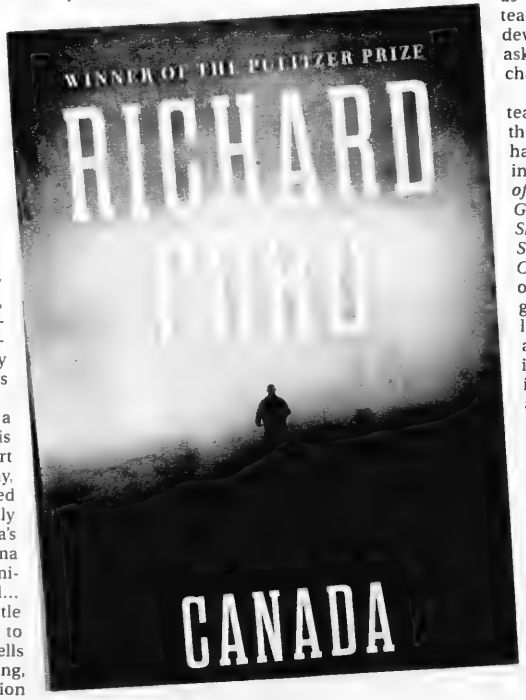
Canadian readers will be particularly drawn to the fact that the back half of the book is set in 1960 in southwestern Saskatchewan, on a landscape that, although utterly unknown to most, still provides Ford with a rich backdrop upon which to study time, place and a young man's education on the closeness of "evil... to the normal goings-on that have nothing to do with evil."

This latter, profoundly handled theme, is presented amidst a narrative that tells a largely small-time tale, of small-time actors set on the stage of towns so small they threaten to disappear.

The life of Dell Parsons, a boy of 15 who is an enthusiastic chess player and a loner, ready to begin high school, is upended when his parents make the fatal mistake of robbing a bank not far from their home in Great Falls, Mont. Ford is an expert at conveying Dell's father's southern vanity, his aimlessness, the blanks in his personality, and his way of misreading events, places and other people, all of which contribute to the woozy behaviour that destroys his family.



Dell's mother is a different story. She is "Neeva Kamper (short for Geneva)... a tiny, intense, bespectacled woman with unruly brown hair." Neeva's parents live "in Tacoma and were Jewish immigrants from Poland... Being Jews meant little to them by then, or to our mother," Dell tells us, "just an old, exacting, constricted conception of life they were happy to put behind them."

These aspects of Dell's background are submerged in the overall movement of the novel in a way that forces the reader to consider them with great care. When Dell's parents are quickly arrested, his mother's citizenship status is inexplicably questioned, and her name is misspelled in newspaper reports, as if her difference, however vaguely apparent, is something American authorities cannot ignore.

The strangest part of the novel – and much of Canada is satisfyingly strange – takes place once Dell has been driven over the Canadian border by a friend of his mother's, in order to avoid the fate of a state juvenile institution. In Saskatchewan, Dell settles into a rough existence, among men who are faintly mysterious, eking out a living in the hardscrabble prairie economy. Dell is put to work as a guide and all-purpose helper as part of the goose hunting business that attracts Americans to the area.

What transpires in the town of Fort Royal, Sask. and its surroundings cannot be told here without ruining the reader's enjoyment of the novel. These events borrow elements from the elegant noir novels of Raymond Chandler, the best movies of Humphrey Bogart, and are told in prose so simple and direct that the scenes flare up before the reader as if they are in fact being presented on a great old movie palace screen.

Dell's experiences in Saskatchewan provide a second scene of instruction, and send him off to a more placid and normal life in Winnipeg and Windsor, Ont. as a married high school teacher. In this work he develops the tendency to ask his students subtly challenging questions.

The list of books he teaches seems to cue the reader to books that have provided Ford with inspiration: "The Heart of Darkness, The Great Gatsby, The Sheltering Sky, The Nick Adams Stories, The Mayor of Casterbridge." The first of these is among the great studies of the relationship between evil and normality; Gatsby is possibly the best investigation, in lyric and sad prose, of the failure of the American dream; while in Hemingway's Nick Adams Stories we find a tableau of youth against the backdrop of Midwestern wilderness. Dell adds that "these books aren't taught now to high school students in Canada. Who knows why?"

This latter question arrives with great impact, as does another reflection late in the novel on the way certain stories are representative of their time. Dell's story of quiet flight over the U.S.-Canada border could not "happen now, since the towers, and with the border being sealed. It is a long time ago."

Canada, for the most part, is about a faraway time and place. But it manages, in ingenious and subtle ways, to illuminate how we live now.

Little has been made in reviews and interviews with Ford of the Jewish sub-theme in his book. The last line of the novel points back to this issue, as it ostentatiously echoes the once well known ending of Saul Bellow's great study of evil and normality, Mr. Sammler's Planet.

I was sorry to finish Canada, but Ford provides the reader with a list of related masterpieces with which to fill up the remains of the summer.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

Toronto comic writes for hit TV show

David Silverberg
Special to The CJN

While most University of Toronto students plastered their dorm rooms with rock posters or classic painting prints, Rebecca Addelman hung up a collage of Conan O'Brien, Adam Sandler and Mike Myers, three of her comedic heroes.

It was just one of the telltale hints Addelman would be turning to a life of comedy that would take her from her hometown in Ottawa to the comedy clubs in Toronto and on to the hallowed halls of Hollywood.

Addelman, who now lives in Los Angeles, has scored a truly coveted gig: writing for the hit TV show New Girl starring Zooey Deschanel.

Landing the gig wasn't as arduous as you might expect, she explains. Her agent submitted her script to one of the New Girl show runners, and she got a call practically the next day. "I went to that meeting, then to a second one the day after and was hired the next day," she says.

She began her career by taking improv classes at Toronto's Second City, noting how her first laugh got her hooked to the stage. Her mentors became her fellow comedians. "I was on such a comedy high those first few years. Nothing could disappoint me. Anyone brilliant who could win over a room became a hero in my eyes."

At Grossman's Tavern in downtown Toronto, Addelman ran a series blending music and comedy in an attempt to give fans a taste of something different. She loved taking risks. She recounts one show where she imitated Andy Kaufman and challenged any man in the room to a wrestling match. When she heard her neck snap after one intense bout (she was OK 30 seconds later), she realized stealing Kaufman's bit wasn't her style. "And I also realized I'm very very excessively weak."

She dabbled in TV in Toronto, making a mark as a staff writer on CBC's short-lived InSecurity comedy series. She found working at the network frustrating, she says. "We were shuffled to three different executives in the span of six months – each one giving us radically different notes."

After cutting her TV teeth in Canada, Addelman saw herself as more of a sitcom writer for shows that inspired her, such as 30 Rock or Seinfeld. She moved to Los Angeles to find more opportunities, though she didn't completely leave sketch/improv. She is part of a troupe formed from the well-known Upright Citizens Brigade.

And her biggest gig so far, besides New Girl? "Performing in the Comedy Network's Cream of Comedy special," Addelman says, describing the event as a televised special shot every year with five comics nominated for the Tim Sims Encouragement Award. "Trying to figure out how to do my interactive video bit on such a big scale was an interesting challenge."

The comedian has undoubtedly pushed herself to polish her resumé but what is she hoping to do in the future? How does she want to give back to the community that raised her?

Rebecca Addelman

"I want to be able to hire an unknown writer and give them their first real job," she says. "To have someone see something in you and take a gamble on you, creative it's life-changing."

Actor interprets life of Canadian theatre visionary

Dorothy Lichtblau
Special to The CJN

Alon Nashman was 13 years old when the course of his life was changed by a production directed by the theatre visionary John Hirsch.

Smitten by the magic created onstage, he was determined to become an actor. Now, a veteran, award-winning theatre artist, Nashman is at another significant juncture of his career, ironically inspired by Hirsch's work and life. He is making his Stratford Shakespeare Festival debut in the premier production of Hirsch, a play writer/director/producer Paul Thompson and he co-created.

Nashman credits Thompson with having "the vision and perception that given that it has been more than 20 years since John Hirsch's passing, the time was ripe to bring to the stage the life of the man who viewed theatre as essential to society."

John Stephen Hirsch died in 1989. Throughout his more than 30 years in Canadian theatre, the fiery and demanding director was lauded for his imaginative, innovative interpretations of classic works. Not without controversy, he created landmark productions and revamped the arts in Canada through his stints as co-founder and artistic director of the Manitoba Theatre Centre, artistic director of the Stratford Festival, head of CBC Television Drama and faculty member at the National Theatre School.

In 1987, 40 years after the 17-year-old Hungarian Jewish war orphan came to Canada as a refugee, he was named to the Order of Canada.

Thompson, a former director general of the National Theatre School, proposed the theatre project to Nashman, whose work he has esteemed since Nashman was a student at the NTS. The deal was that the play would be developed as a collaborative effort in which Nashman would play the title role and that Thompson would direct.

Casually, Nashman offers that Stratford Festival's artistic director Des McAnuff and the festival's general director Antoni Cimolino liked the proposed endeavour enough to provide Thompson and Nashman with rehearsal space to build the play. Ultimately, Stratford's head honchos decided to include Hirsch in their 2012 program.

Alon Nashman

Nashman and Thompson initiated work on the project more a year ago by immersing themselves in research.

To discover "who was John Hirsch?" Nashman searched archives, books, journals and letters, viewed videotapes and listened to audio recordings. He also interviewed dozens of Hirsch's colleagues and friends, many of whom are Canadian luminaries the likes of Martha Henry, Douglas Campbell, Rosemary Dunsmore, Colm Feore, Brian Bedford, Martin Knelman, Moses Znaimer and Zoe Caldwell.

Nashman's inquiry garnered rich material about Hirsch's life, but he learned that the man could not be simply defined. Rather, Hirsch was as multi-layered as the tragic heroes he orchestrated on stage.

After completing the groundwork for the project, Nashman took up residence in Stratford to develop the play with Thompson, whom he describes as "a brilliant creator, who does theatre the way no one else in Canada does." Essentially, Thompson engages actors in improvisatory explorations of characters and scenes from the dramatic narrative.

For Hirsch, Thompson would offer Nashman situations to play in a particular manner and in turn Nashman brought in songs or quotes or different takes on how he might approach a moment in the play. As they worked, a scribe recorded what emerged. In other words, the play moved from stage to page and then back to the stage.

In this one-man show, Nashman has the daunting task of presenting the wide-ranging lifetime of a complex man in 90 minutes. In response to questions about the challenges he faced, he says, "I embraced him [Hirsch] in his complexities." Then he goes on to explain that "I benefitted from the freedom of expression that theatre allows."

Yet, though Nashman assumes a low key as he conveys the achievement of performing in Stratford a work that he co-created, it's clear that he is justifiably thrilled to be part of a community in which "theatre artists are really respected" and where artists take pride in craftsmanship.

Reflecting on the process of delving into the life of John Hirsch and performing him on stage, Nashman says, "I grew to love him" with full awareness that Hirsch could be monstrous as well as loving.

According to Nashman, the man was known to be nasty and demanding. He sought a high level of achievement and was not kind to those who didn't deliver. A mass of contradictions, Hirsch was highly theatrical, witty, awkward, vulnerable, generous, caring, dictatorial and ingenious.

"His approach might not be acceptable today," says Nashman. Yet, Hirsch's passion for theatre and his dedication to demonstrating how theatre can serve the human spirit continue to inspire him.

Hirsch runs at the Stratford Festival until Sept. 14.

EYE ON ARTS

By BILL GLADSTONE

SUMMER LITERARY & THEATRICAL COLUMN, PART ONE: THE FRONT PAGE AND *HIS GIRL FRIDAY REVISITED

The phrase "gallows humour" has a particular resonance in regard to Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur's famous 1928 play The Front Page, which is punctuated by the recurrent testing of a gallows in a courtyard of the Chicago courthouse on which death row prisoner Earl Williams is very soon to be hanged for murdering a policeman.

The Shaw Festival's current adaptation of His Girl Friday offers a good excuse to revisit the 1931 movie The Front Page as well as the more famous and definitive 1940 movie His Girl Friday, in which the lead character, ace reporter Hildy Johnson, is cast as a woman instead of a man. (Director Billy Wilder reverted back to a male Hildy in his 1974 version of The Front Page, which starred Jack Lemmon and Walter Matthau, but the result was lacklustre. "I'm against remakes in general," he later remarked, "because if a picture is good, you shouldn't remake it, and if it's lousy, why remake it? ... It was not one of my pictures I was particularly proud of.")

In the 1928 play, the male Hildy Johnson is determined to quit the newspaper racket to get married but his boss, Walter Burns, resorts to underhanded trickery to get him to stay at least long enough to cover the hanging. The action begins as Hildy makes what is supposed to be a quick farewell visit to his buddies in the courthouse press room as his fiancé and her mother wait in a taxi-cab outside.

Suddenly shots are heard and alarm bells ring: Earl Williams has escaped from his jail cell in the courthouse. (The convicted man, asked to re-enact the crime, had been inadvertently handed a loaded gun.) The adrenalin-charged reporters rush out after the story, leaving Hildy alone. A moment later the escaped prisoner clambers into the window, giving Hildy the scoop of his life.

The play's cynical and darkly humourous portrayal of newspapermen and politicians made it a great hit. The 1931 movie, starring Pat O'Brien as Hildy and Adolphe Menjou as Walter Burns, seemed to define the late-1920s American urban newsroom as a manic place where soulless reporters happily bartered their own mothers, or at least their future mother-in-laws, for a sensational story.

In His Girl Friday, director Howard Hawks brilliantly transformed the story into a screwball romance featuring a female Hildy (Rosalind Russell), newly divorced from newspaper editor Burns (Cary Grant) and about to marry a hapless insurance salesman (Ralph Bellamy).

The Shaw Festival's His Girl Friday is an adaptation by playwright John Guare that combines aspects of the original play with the 1931 and 1940 films, and keeps Hildy as a woman. But it doesn't respect the period: the action is set in 1939 and a few superfluous references to Hitler and the war in Europe make the characters more self-absorbed and vainglorious than necessary. More added baggage comes in the form of a shapely woman who crosses the set at key moments, interrupting the action and transforming the newsmen into howling wolves.

The cast, led by Nicole Underhay and Benedict Campbell, is superb in the delivery of the trademark rapid-fire dialogue. However, the production, directed by Jim Mezon, keeps up its frenetic pace for more than two and a half hours with little contrapuntal relief. As in a Marx Brothers film, farce and screwball comedy should be counterbalanced with at least one realistic person or situation.

Hecht and MacArthur depicted a world in which politicians and reporters are equally indifferent about social justice. It emerges that Williams was not the crazed political radical that the mayor, seeking re-election on a law-and-order platform, painted him to be. In truth, he shot the policeman by accident and in self-defence.

The reporters write stories filled with sensational lies just to sell newspapers. They urge the justice department to move the hanging from 7 to 5 a.m. so it will make the early editions. And the mayor is just as corrupt and scheming as newspaper editor Walter Burns. Found to be hiding Williams in a roll-top desk, Hildy and Walter are arrested for obstructing justice, but they beat the rap because they know the mayor had tried to stifle the governor's last-minute reprieve of Williams.

In the 1940 movie, Hildy always manages to score hard-to-get interviews and spin them into exquisite front-page stories. Alone among her colleagues, she interviews Williams in his jail cell, then tells his story sympathetically and truthfully to the world, demonstrating a compassion that sets her apart from the wolf-pack. But these essential redeeming features are lost in Guare's adaptation.

Other plays in the Shaw Festival's current season include Ragtime, Present Laughter, A Man and Some Women, The Millionairess, Hedda Gabler, Trouble in Tahiti, Misalliance, French Without Tears, Come Back, Little Sheba, and Helen's Necklace. For more information please visit shawfest.com

Actor on national tour 'living her dreams'

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Mandy Striph, 24, says being Jewish influenced her career path in musical theatre.

"I didn't start taking voice lessons until the cantor at my synagogue suggested it. He told my parents that I had potential, and the voice lessons started soon thereafter."

The Ohio native, who now lives in New York City, is currently on tour with NETworks Presentations' Beauty and the Beast. The Disney musical just finished its run at the Four Seasons Centre for the Performing Arts in Toronto on July 22.

Striph was cast in the ensemble and is also the understudy for Mrs. Potts and the Wardrobe.

"I'm very grateful for the opportunity," she said. "There are so many girls trying to do exactly what I'm doing, and somehow, I'm the lucky one that is living her dreams."

Striph moved to New York in September 2010 and auditioned for Beauty and the Beast. She went through a few rounds of callbacks over the next few days and was told she might hear something in a few months.

In January, she auditioned again upon request, but was "really sick and didn't do very well." In March, Striph was called in one more time.

"I got the phone call that afternoon telling me to pack my bags and join the tour. It just happened to be my dad's birthday. Nothing felt better than calling home and saying, 'Happy Birthday, dad. I got the job and we play Toledo [her hometown] next year!'"

Striph said her passion for theatre began at age three or four, when her father took her to see the stage version of 101 Dalmatians. "He painted my face and put me in my Dalmatians T-shirt. We sat on the aisle and I was chosen from the audience to come on stage and be the watchdog for the bad guys. I had to bark when they showed up on stage to warn the other puppies. I was pretty much a goner after that. I've been doing theatre ever since."

Striph's previous roles include Logainne in 25th Annual Putnam County Spelling Bee and Anita in West Side Story. She has starred in various productions of Oklahoma! and Thoroughly Modern Millie.

She said she's very proud of her role as Logainne. "It's hard to play a child with a lateral lisp without making them a caricature. It was difficult and there was a lot of trial and error but I'm proud of the finished product."

Striph's training started in elementary school, where she took dance and voice lessons. In her college years, she studied at Ohio State University before deciding to audition for the musical theatre program at

Mandy Striph

Indiana University.

Striph completed a bachelor of fine arts in musical theatre at Indiana, and her class was the first to ever graduate with this degree from the university.

Now on her first national theatre tour, Striph said she enjoys being on the road. "I've seen so many places in both the U.S. and Canada. I've experienced such crazy things, including being trapped between avalanches in Alaska, which I would never have dreamed would happen to me."

She said her Beauty and the Beast cast members are some of her closest friends. "I can't imagine traipsing around the continent with anybody else."

While Striph is thrilled to be working as an actress, she said the theatre industry can be very intimidating.

"The biggest challenges are always in my head. It's hard to walk into a room where there are 400 girls and 200 of them look exactly like you. It's difficult to convince yourself that you are special and you have something that none of the other girls have. It's very much mind over matter."

She said her biggest goal is to continue to get hired. "I'd love to be on Broadway some day, singing and dancing my heart out. I'd love to try film and TV acting. The coolest thing I want to do is be a voice actor for a Pixar or Disney movie."

Asked about advice she has for aspiring actors, Striph said, "Don't give up. If this is what makes you happy, then don't give up. Also, know your type. Know realistically what parts you would play and go to auditions that are appropriate for that. It will make your life easier and it will make it easier for casting directors to cast you as well."

Striph said her friends and family have always been supportive of her career choices. "When Beauty and the Beast played in my hometown, all of my friends that are still there were so excited to see that I was actually doing this as a career and that I was making it in a competitive field."

CFL commish sees opportunities in Toronto

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you turn on your TV and tune in to one of the CFL games this weekend, you'll have plenty of company. On average, 800,000 Canadians watch a typical game of three-down football.

Turn it on during the Grey Cup and you'll be one of five or six million Canadians enjoying the fall classic.

Mark Cohon is all smiles as he relates that information, and he's even more excited about the season that just kicked off.

As commissioner of the CFL, you'd expect him to be, but unlike predecessors who were constantly putting out fires, saving franchises or, if you go back far enough, watching U.S. franchises dissolve, he's got pretty good reason to smile.

The CFL is now into its 100th season, and the league's head office has planned a number of events to celebrate the milestone, culminating with the Grey Cup in Toronto on Nov. 25.

The Grey Cup game, Cohon proudly points out, is already sold out. In advance of the contest, a train will ferry the actual trophy – named after the same governor-general who gave his name to the famous tea – to 100 communities across the country, beginning in early September.

There are other celebratory events on tap, Cohon continued: Canada Post is issuing a commemorative stamp in honour of the game; the league will publish a book recounting the game's history, and TSN, which owns the broadcast rights to the game, will present eight films that relate the league to important social events in Canadian history, such as Chuck Ealey's arrival as the first black quarterback in the CFL.

"The films will reflect what was going on in the country," Cohon said in an interview in the league's downtown Toronto office.

In a sort of "state of the league" review, Cohon said the CFL is on firm financial footing. Western franchises are pretty healthy: Saskatchewan registered a $6 million profit last year, while Winnipeg earned in the neighbourhood of $2.5 million.

Mark Cohon

Instead of past concerns over the viability of franchises, the league is looking to grow: Ottawa is slated to get a franchise in 2014, and legal efforts to derail renovation of the city's Lansdowne Park facility have failed.

Testifying to the league's strength are new stadiums going up in Winnipeg and Hamilton, while ownership is stable across the league, even if you consider that one owner, David Braley, owns two franchises, the B.C. Lions and the Toronto Argonauts, he said.

"Braley has been a champion of the league for 20 years," Cohon said. "He's invested in the league through tough times… His heart is in the right place."

And, there is precedent for dual ownership of franchises. As commissioner, he continued, his job is to ensure that "the integrity of the game is in place."

So when proponents of a "conspiracy theory" argue that the league was behind a seemingly one-side trade that sent Edmonton Eskimos all-star Ricky Ray to the Toronto Argonauts for journeyman QB Steven Jyles, kicker Grant Shaw and Toronto's first pick, in the 2012 Canadian college draft, Cohon stresses that he only approves trades, he doesn't make them.

And if there was a conspiracy behind the trade – supposedly to strengthen Toronto and get them into the Grey Cup game at home – it didn't pan out in the first week of play. In a head-to-head match up in Edmonton, the Eskimos defeated the Argos, despite the disparity at quarterback, by a 19-15 margin.

But certainly there is something to the view that Toronto remains the league's weak link. News of the Argos is usually relegated to somewhere in the middle or back of the newspaper sports section, and the Rogers Centre is usually half-filled at best – attendance averaged 20,000 fans in 2011, with capacity being 45,000.

There seems to be no buzz about the team, as Torontonians gaze enviously south hoping to land an NFL team. And as Winnipeg head coach Paul LaPolice remarked last season, playing football in Rogers Centre is like playing in a mall.

(Former Bombers lineman Doug Brown put it this way, last year, citing LaPolice: "He said it was like playing in a mall, where you can hear the elevator music and people are screaming for their kids and you hear the shoppers milling around and stuff like that.")

Ever the optimist, Cohon does not like to use the term "challenge" when discussing the Argos. He's more positive in his evaluation: "The biggest opportunity is here in Toronto," he said instead.

Steps have been taken to address the issue of fan support.

The team held its pre-season game in the middle of the afternoon, to attract school kids. Some 30,000 showed up. The club has also undertaken an anti-bullying campaign, and there's an effort under way to reach out to new Canadians, Cohon said.

The team is attempting to improve its on-field product by bringing in Ray, and it's increasing its media footprint by focusing on player personalities such as receiver Chad Owens, running back Cory Boyd, Ray and others, he added.

Now if all that can translate into higher ratings and greater attendance, Cohon might no longer have to sidestep questions about challenges, as the opportunities will really have materialized.

French youth unaware of WWII Jewish roundup

JTA

PARIS – Most young Frenchmen never heard of the World War II roundup of Paris Jews, a survey shows.

The recent survey showed most young French adults were unaware of the deportation of Parisian Jews during the Holocaust.

Sixty per cent of respondents aged 18 to 24 said they never heard of the Vel d'Hiv Roundup of July 16-17, 1942, when French police rounded up some 13,000 Jews in and around Paris. They were held near the Eiffel Tower before being shipped for extermination to Auschwitz.

The Union of French Jewish Students commissioned the leading polling company CSA to perform the survey, which includes answers from 1,056 respondents. The union published the results on the 70th anniversary of the deportation.

The survey showed young adults know less about the roundup than the average French adult. Among the general population, 42 per cent of respondents had never heard of the roundup.

In 1995, then-President Jacques Chirac apologized for the French police's role in the murder of the Jews arrested in the Vel d'Hiv Roundup. Popularly known in French as La Rafle (The Raid), the roundup has been the subject of books, poems and movies.

Dr. Richard Prasquier

The survey revealed 32 per cent of young French adults knew that French police had been responsible for arresting the Jews of Paris. That figure was 46 per cent among the general population.

Eighty-five per cent of all respondents said teaching about the Holocaust was "important."

Dr. Richard Prasquier, president of the CRIF umbrella group of French Jewish communities, said the poll shows "there is a lot that needs to be done, but there are also positive points."

Meanwhile, an exhibit of police archives from the French deportation, including photos, signatures and records of personal possessions from many of the victims, went on display last week in Paris.

MBA student mixes business with science

Michelle Bitran
Intern

When David Kideckel began his doctorate in neuroimaging, the study of images of the brain, he realized that there were more ways to approach science than he once thought.

Kideckel wanted to learn about the business side of science. Now, with his PhD in hand, he's carving a path in an exciting, emerging field by combining his science expertise with his business know-how.

The 32-year-old scientist won a prestigious Science to Business Award from the Canadian Institutes of Health Research (CIHR), which has sent him back to school for a master of business administration in health-care management and consulting at the University of Toronto's Rotman School of Management.

He is completing the program part-time while maintaining a full-time job at Janssen Pharmaceuticals, Inc. and caring for his 3-1/2-year-old daughter, Ora, with his wife, Sari.

"It's certainly an exercise in time management," Kideckel said with a laugh. But, despite his busy schedule, he finds time to run marathons as a hobby and to spend quality time with his family.

Making the time to combine his passions for science and business has been an important part of Kideckel's life since he began his doctorate.

Kideckel, who is originally from Winnipeg, quickly realized that there were many opportunities for people willing to acquire knowledge and skills in science and business, but that students weren't eager to crossover academic disciplines.

"It's just that, traditionally, in academia, so many different departments are in their own silos," he said, explaining that the traditional university setting can make it difficult for students to explore interests in different subjects simultaneously.

Kideckel admitted that when he first became interested in pursuing business he was met with some resistance from other people in his field. "To push the more business side of things in science was a challenge," he said.

David Kideckel rests after finishing the Scotiabank Toronto Waterfront Marathon. When he's not busy working or going to school for his MBA, Kideckel enjoys running and spending time with his family.

Not only, he explained, did many people in the sciences prefer to stick to their own discipline, but most of those who did have other interests didn't want to go through the struggle of finding a way to study something completely new.

"A lot of students are just too comfortable with the status quo," Kideckel said.

But the status quo didn't cut it for him.

Where many students might have stuck to one field in order to simplify their studies, Kideckel was adamant about adding business skills to his life-science expertise, and he began to chase every possibility that would let him do so.

"I guess I've always had an entrepreneurial spirit," he said.

To build his leadership and business abilities, Kideckel served on the Institute of Medical Science Students' Association (IMSSA) council for three years and was elected its president during the last year of his doctoral studies at U of T.

He co-founded and served as vice-president of U of T's Graduate Management Consulting Association, and he also interned on the business development end for two biotech start-ups, one of which was run out of Canadian innovation hothouse MaRS.

Kideckel's keen interest and hard work also led him to be selected as one of three Canadians to take part in a Novartis International Biotechnology Leadership event in Cambridge, Mass., in 2009. Novartis, based in Switzerland, is one of the biggest multinational pharmaceutical companies in the world.

With his experience in the business end of the scientific world, Kideckel decided to apply for the CIHR Science to Business scholarship, designed for people who have their doctorate in the sciences, and he's now in the first year of his MBA.

"It's been really great," Kideckel said of his experience so far in the program. He attends classes two mornings per week from 7 to 9 a.m. before heading to work.

The additional business skills he is acquiring at school, he said, help him to be even more effective in his work environment, and to make the most of his science background. "I'm able to understand and apply the science in ways that people without the science background wouldn't necessarily be able to," he said.

Kideckel is urging other people who have studied science to follow in his footsteps, both for the potential to make major contributions to people's lives and health through science and for the chance to help develop an emerging field.

"It's an untapped area with tons of potential," he said, explaining that people are still catching on to this new field with its many career opportunities.

The combined skill set allows people to work in areas like intellectual property, patent law, research, innovation and the commercialization of scientific breakthroughs.

"There's a huge demand for this," Kideckel said, adding that these careers continue to be vital and the opportunities for them are available, even in a tough economic climate.

Kideckel is determined to make it easier for students to prepare for this career path. During his time as president of the IMMSA, he began working toward his goal of creating a joint PhD-MBA program. His hard work and campaigning has paid off, as U of T is planning to implement the unique joint program in the coming years.

For young people thinking about going the science-to-business route, Kideckel has some important words of advice.

"Network as much as you can to really hear first hand from people what their experiences were," he said, adding that it is also important to get involved in campus organizations and committees related to your interests.

For Kideckel, nothing beats the hands-on experience of getting involved and pursuing your goals.

"I believe in doing something and not just reading about it."

But will it be kosher?

How often have you been at a community fundraiser or life-cycle event such as a wedding or a bar or bat-mitzvah and been asked the question, "Do you want the beef or the chicken?"

You probably don't think about the environmental impact of putting meat on a plate, and you probably aren't thinking about the kashrut of emerging meat production methods.

A 2006 report put out by the United Nations, Food and Agricultural Organization claimed that meat production was one of the major contributors to global environmental degradation.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

The report said that livestock raised for meat uses 30 per cent of global ice-free terrestrial land and eight per cent of global freshwater, while producing 18 per cent of global greenhouse gas emissions, which is more than the entire global transportation sector.

One of the speakers at this year's annual Ideacity conference, held in mid-June in Toronto, touched on research she is involved with that could have a positive impact on these numbers.

Daisy van der Schaft is an assistant professor in the department of biomedical engineering at Eindhoven University of Technology in the Netherlands. Her presentation focused on reducing the negative environmental impact of meat production by growing animal muscle tissue in vitro instead of growing whole animals.

This technology is called cultured meat (or in vitro meat) production, and it's currently in the research stage at a number of laboratories around the world that are producing small quantities of cultured meat. Large-scale production requires further research and development.

In addition to environmental impacts, cultured meat has other potential benefits compared to conventionally produced meat.

Cultured meat can prevent the spread of animal-borne diseases and has the potential to reduce diseases that result from human-animal contact. As well, because it's being developed in a controlled environment, the manipulation of nutritional, textural and taste profiles is possible. For example, by controlling the quantity and quality of fat, nutrition-related illnesses such as cardiovascular diseases can be reduced.

As science fiction moves toward science fact, the question that kept coming to mind was whether this type of meat would be considered kosher.

I reached out to Rabbi Mordecai Torczyner, head of the Yeshiva University Torah-MiTzion Beit Midrash in Toronto and posed a few questions.

- Would the meat be considered kosher if the cells were taken from a kosher animal?
- Would this "grown meat" be considered pareve or fleishig?
- Where in the process would kosher supervision need to be applied?

Rabbi Torczyner indicated that until this type of "meat plant" is approved for human consumption by groups charged with food safety and health, such as the U.S. Food and Drug Administration or the Canadian Food Inspection Agency, it's unlikely that any kashrut certification body will provide any definitive guidance.

"Hypothetically," he added, "the kosher certification authority would need to review the processes involved and determine the original source of the meat and its derivation from actual animal cells, or synthetic materials replicating the DNA structure."

Cheaper and environmentally sustainable kosher meat may still be a few years away. But we can dream, can't we?

GARLIC FRIES

8 garlic cloves, minced
6 tbsp olive oil
3 russet potatoes, each cut into 12 wedges
3 tbsp cornstarch
1 1/2 tsp coarse sea salt
1 1/2 tsp ground black pepper
½ tsp garlic powder
1/4 tsp cayenne pepper

Preheat oven to 440° F. Combine garlic and oil in large bowl. warm in microwave until garlic is fragrant, about 1 min. Transfer 5 tbsp oil (leaving garlic in bowl) to baking sheet covered with parchment paper, coating it well. Add potatoes to the bowl with garlic mixture; toss to coat. Cover bowl in plastic wrap and microwave on high 3-6 min. until potatoes are translucent, shaking bowl to redistribute the potatoes halfway through cooking.

Combine cornstarch, salt, pepper, garlic powder, cayenne in small bowl. Sprinkle over hot potatoes; toss well to coat. Arrange potatoes in single layer on prepared baking sheet. Bake, turning once, until deep golden brown and crisp, 30-40 min.

A nail in the coffin for Yiddish

Hindy Nosek-Abelson

Guest Voice

I was shocked to read in The CJN that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto chose to drive a nail into the coffin of Yiddish by withdrawing all support ("Federation cuts Yiddish funding," July 12).

It appears, however, that to placate lobbyists, federation decided to fund the Committee for Yiddish by far less than the $36,000 they gave before, claiming that Holocaust survivors, Jewish education and Israel are a bigger priority. This doesn't makes sense.

Let's start with Holocaust survivors. Yiddish is the mother tongue of the majority of survivors of the Shoah. Has federation asked the dwindling number of survivors how they feel about the fact that the language they argued, laughed, cried, made love in, and breathed on a daily basis could now die with them, simply because Yiddish isn't a federation priority?

Is that because our community leaders are leaving the near-sighted to lead the blind? Or do they not care? Either way, thanks to them, the language of Holocaust survivors will likely accompany them to the grave.

Federation's other stated priority is Jewish education. Yiddish is more than 1,000 years old. It's embedded in every Jewish struggle and accomplishment of the last millennium. It's the voice with which our ancestors speak to us.

To hear what life was like at the turn of the 20th century, to hear what a pogrom felt like, to understand how the Bolshevik Revolution affected Jewish society, to teach about the vast number of political movements that sprang up between the wars requires access to thousands of Yiddish books and films.

The joy of learning songs their ancestors sang or seeing films they watched will bring children as close to their heritage as expensive trips or outreach programs. With Yiddish, they'll see how Jewish secular life then compared to secular Jewish existence today and be inspired to make changes. Women's rights, the Enlightenment, tradition, sexual revolutions, gangsters, philosophers, scholars, musicians, playwrights, drunks, saints and sinners – it's all relevant, rich, unsanitized and real. And it's right there for us in Yiddish.

Yiddish reflected and shaped our Jewish character. Without Yiddish, Jewish education becomes woefully inadequate, capable only of transmitting all there is to know about Jewish persecution but next to nothing about Jewish joy, life and culture. Is that the Jewish education federation wants?

Finally, federation's other priority, Israel. Thankfully, we've reached the point where we need Israel as much as it needs us. They're right. We do have to expose youth to Israel. However, it's not an either/or situation, as federation seems to imply by the decision to offer less support to the Yiddish committee. There is more than one path to Jewish hearts and minds. We also need to learn about Jewish history in the Galut (Diaspora).

If federation really cared about Holocaust survivors, education and Jewish identity, they wouldn't cut Yiddish funding. They'd increase it and make Yiddish one of the tools in a "complete Jewish education" kit.

My parents taught me never to give Adolf Hitler a posthumous victory. Hitler did his best to kill Yiddish and almost succeeded. Shamefully, federation now appears quite willing to allow it to die.

US. Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney took some time from his visit with Israeli and Palestinian leaders earlier this week to place a note in the Kotel. [Flash90 photo]

Romney calls Jerusalem Israel's capital

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Former Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erekat said that Mitt Romney's recognition of Jerusalem as Israel's capital was "unacceptable."

Erekat said that Romney's statement during a policy speech on Sunday, in which the U.S. Republican presidential candidate said that Jerusalem is "the capital of Israel," goes against years of U.S. policy. The status of Jerusalem is one of the most sensitive issues in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, as both sides claim it as a capital.

"At the end of the day, the U.S. has interests in this region. It has embassies in 57 Arab and Muslim countries," Erekat told the Associated Press. "I don't think they will sacrifice everything for such statements, mere disturbing statements that will strengthen extremists in the region."

Erekat helped negotiate the Oslo accords between Israel and the Palestinians in 1993 and resigned as Palestinian chief negotiator in 2011. He remains an aide to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

On Sunday and Monday, as part of a trip to Israel, Romney met with several Israeli leaders, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres. He also met with Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad. He did not meet with Abbas, nor did he mention the Palestinians once during Sunday's policy speech.

During his speech on Sunday, Mitt Romney slammed his Democratic rival, contrary to his promise not to criticize the U.S. president on foreign soil, saying public expressions of diplomatic distance is damaging to Israel.

"Diplomatic distance that is public and critical emboldens Israel's adversaries," said Romney, alluding to the Obama administration's stance on Israel.

Romney's speech followed a day spent meeting Israel's leaders on his official visit to the country.

Romney opened his speech by saying it was a "moving experience to be in Jerusalem," which he described as, "Israel's capital."

Morgan Sworn In

TORONTO — Former Canadian Jewish Congress president Ed Morgan was sworn in last week as a judge of the Superior Court of Justice in Toronto. Morgan had been a professor at the University of Toronto's Faculty of Law since 1986. He practised with Davies Ward & Beck from 1989 to 1997, focusing on commercial litigation, constitutional litigation, private international law and human rights law. He was president of Congress from 2004 to 2007. The American-born Morgan holds a BA from Northwestern University, a bachelor of laws from U of T and a master of laws from Harvard University.

CTV Defends Music

TORONTO — CTV defended a decision by its Ottawa CTV Two station to let a local band play an anti-Israel song on its morning show. The all-female acoustic trio Three Little Birds sang a song titled Apartheid during its June 18 appearance, the pro-Israel media watchdog HonestReporting Canada said. The group was on Morning Live to promote a new album and a show at the Ottawa Jazz Festival. The band said it wrote the song "in response to the banning of a poster at Carleton University that depicted the bombardment of Gaza in 2008-2009." CTV regional vice-president Richard Gray said it's not uncommon for bands to make political statements "and also not something we are overly concerned about… creating controversy is what musicians often do."

World

Heavy Metal Hack

OSLO — An Iranian nuclear scientist told a Finnish cybersecurity expert via email that a virus caused the AC/DC song Thunderstruck to play from computers at two Iranian nuclear plants. Computers at the Nantaz and Fordo facilities reportedly blasted the heavy metal song at full volume in the middle of the night last month. The virus also shut down part of the network. Mikko Hypponen, chief research officer at the Finnish security firm F-Secure, who got the emails, couldn't confirm the reports.

Demography Dispute

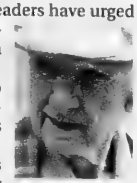
NEW YORK — A leading Jewish demographer is disputing findings of a widely cited recent survey on New York Jewry. Len Saxe, of Brandeis University, told the New York Jewish Week that the survey overestimated the number of Orthodox Jews in the city. He agreed with the finding that the city's overall Jewish population has grown. The survey found about 1.5 million Jews live in New York City and two surrounding counties, and that one-third are Orthodox. The survey was done for UJA-Federation of New York and released in June. Saxe said that data on the Orthodox clashed with data reported by the Avi Chai Foundation in 2009 on the number of Orthodox children in day schools. Steven M. Cohen, one of the study's authors told the Jewish Week that "the main contours of our findings" were correct.

Alleged War Criminal's Extradition Sought

BRATISLAVA — Slovakian Jewish leaders have urged Hungary to extradite an alleged Holocaust war criminal who was once a Canadian citizen.



Laszlo Csizsik-Csatary

Laszlo Csizsik-Csatary, 97, came to Canada in 1949 and obtained citizenship in 1955. He left in 1997, 10 years after his past came to light.

He's accused of sending 15,700 Jews to their deaths in 1944, as an officer at the time in the Hungarian Royal Police. His town, Kosice, then part of Hungary, is now part of Slovakia.

The extradition call came from the Slovakian Federation of Jewish Communities. Last month, after being tipped off to his location by reporters from a British tabloid, Hungarian authorities placed Csizsik-Csatary under house arrest and charged him with "unlawful torture of human beings." He faces life in prison.

Yemen Blues, Socalled headline Ashkenaz

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Israeli world-music superstars Yemen Blues and Shye Ben Tzur, and Canadian Jewish-roots music innovators Socalled and Finjan are among the headliners at the ninth biennial Ashkenaz Festival, which kicks off Aug. 28 and runs through the Labour Day weekend.

Late-night, east European blowouts with Russia's Opa and Toronto's Lemon Bucket Orkestra, plus a tour de force production of The Corpse Bride by Toronto's Theatre Panik, are also among the highlights.

"We want to be a giant tent that anyone – Jewish and non-Jewish – can sit under and enjoy and be entertained," said Eric Stein, Ashkenaz Foundation's artistic director.

"Originally a stage for Yiddish and klezmer revival artists to share their talents with other performers and the Jewish community at large, we've now broadened our mix of programming to include a vast range of pan-Jewish and cross-cultural art and performers. The festival reflects as much of our own city's multicultural flavour, as it does the diversity and vibrancy in Jewish artistic creation worldwide."

The Ashkenaz Festival is the largest Jewish cultural event in Canada where local and international artists come together to celebrate Toronto's diverse cultural communities.

The festival offers a world-class program of music, film, theatre, dance, literature, craft and visual arts, with nearly all the programming provided free. Ashkenaz draws an attendance of some 60,000 people from as far away as Europe, Israel and the United States.

London, but no Olympic spirit

From the editor's desk...

The 2012 Summer Olympics opened last week in a festival of pomp and pageantry for which the British are so notably and justifiably famous. London was a fairy-tale postcard of spectacle, grandeur, light, sound, music and fireworks.

For athletes, promoters, organizers, the British government, television networks, sponsors and billions of viewers around the world, all seemed well and right on the storied, historic streets of London.

But barely three weeks earlier, a different pageant ran its course on the cold cobblestone network of old London.

The General Synod of the United Church of England voted by large majorities among its bishops, clergy and lay leaders to endorse the work of the World Council of Churches' Ecumenical Accompaniment Programme in Palestine and Israel (EAPPI).

Despite its lofty title, the EAPPI inculcates the most brazen of anti-Israel and even anti-Jewish behaviour in the "graduates" of its program and in the countless individuals whom they influence. The very first words of the EAPPI's website set off alarm bells in the mind of the experienced reader of anti-Israel propaganda: "The EAPPI brings internationals to the West Bank to experience life under occupation." And so on.

The ubiquitous reference to "peace" in the numerous entries on the website cannot mask, indeed care little to mask, the anti-Israel orientation of the organization.

The editorialist of the London Jewish Chronicle referred to the group as being "grotesquely partisan." The president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, Vivian Wineman, called EAPPI "an inflammatory and partisan program" that "lacks any kind of balance. Its graduates return with simplistic and radical perspectives" who have harassed and abused Jews.

But disappointment in the church's wholehearted embrace of EAPPI was only part of the bitter fare swallowed by the Jewish community in England. Indeed, given the charged anti-Israel climate covering much of the terrain of the academic and intellectual world of Britain, the outcome was probably no surprise.

Rather, it was the manner of the rejection of the community's pleas to the Synod – brusque, crude and entirely offensive – that may have been lethal poison to inter-faith relations. As reported in the Jewish Chronicle, Wineman accused the Synod of "riding roughshod" over the Jewish community.

"The Jewish community does not need lessons from the Anglican Church in justice and peace," Wineman added in equal measures of anger and pain. A week before the Synod meeting, Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks warned that uncritical endorsement of EAPPI would do "serious damage to Jewish-Christian relations."

Jonathan Arkush, senior vice-president of the Board of Deputies, told the Chronicle that he was as troubled by the language used in the debate as in its outcome. The language, Arkush said, evoked "nothing but simple antisemitic themes from history."

The propounder of the motion that launched the debate, Rev. John Dinnen, set the revealingly disheartening tone by touching upon all of the familiar, vulgar tropes.

The Chronicle explained the significance of the vote: "No one should be in any doubt about what is going on here. A debate about Israel in which speakers refer to 'powerful lobbies,' the money supposedly spent by Jews on lobbying, 'Jewish-sounding names' and the actions of Jews 'bringing shame on the memory of victims of the Holocaust' is not a debate about Israel. It is a debate about Jews."

And that is precisely the point that has been made for many years now by many scholars and observers, including Irwin Cotler and Irving Abella, about the obsessive, single-minded, fanatical, near pathological focus upon Israel. In many cases it is propelled by an unsubtle antisemitism. For such critics of the Jewish state, Israel is "the Jew" among nations that – just as individual Jews were throughout most of European history - must be isolated, punished, excoriated and despised.

Finally, as noted by the Chronicle, "perhaps the most extraordinary comment came from the retiring Archbishop of Canterbury in his explicit comparison between the Holocaust and the deprivations of Palestinians crossing at checkpoints."

In the same edition of the Chronicle, there was a small news item that pro-Palestinian activists and organizers were planning to disrupt performances by Israel's famed Batsheva Dance Company at the upcoming Edinburgh International Festival.

London and the proud people of England greeted the visiting Olympic athletes last week in an effusively humanitarian spirit. It is a shame they are not extending that spirit to the Batsheva dancers later this summer and that they have never extended it to the Jewish state itself, which the dancers happen to represent.

Federation staff commemorates Munich athletes

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The State of Israel has learned two lessons from the murder of 11 Israeli coaches and athletes by Palestinian terrorists 40 years ago at the Olympics in Munich, says Yossi Tanuri, Jerusalem-based director general of UIA Federations Canada.

They are that there's no place to hold the Olympics that is safe for Israelis, and that Israelis do not depend on anyone else for their safety, Tanuri told 100 UJA Federation of Greater Toronto staff members at a commemoration July 27.

Speaking at a brief ceremony at the Lipa Green Centre on the opening day of the London Games, he said that every Israeli child knows about Munich.

He tells his own children that they are part of a larger community. "The Olympic Games were supposed to symbolize that. This is where all nations, colours and religions get together to play, and to challenge each other," he said.

"In that particular spot of harmony and togetherness happened one of the worst times in the history of the State of Israel, the Jewish people, and also of world sports."

Tanuri said he learned recently that Munich was the impetus for former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin to launch the raid on Entebbe in 1976. Entebbe, in turn, was one of Tanuri's own motivations to join the IDF unit that took part in the rescue there.

Jeff Springer, the federation's senior vice-president of corporate affairs, read a prayer in memory of the athletes. He noted that the International Olympic Committee, "despite heavy pressure, refused to hold a moment of silence during the games' opening ceremonies." A moment of silence was observed as part of the federation commemoration.

Every Israeli child knows about Munich

The ceremony concluded with the singing of Hatikvah as pictures of 2004 Olympic windsurfing gold medalist Gal Friedman were shown on a large screen – a reminder, according to Taali Lester Tollman, the federation's vice-president of marketing, that "Israel's Olympic history has also reached great heights."

Academic consortium will build Mediterranean research centre

Spurred on by the recent discovery of a vast offshore natural gas reserve that's expected to serve Israel's domestic needs for the next century, a consortium of Israeli academic institutions headed by the University of Haifa has won a tender to build a world-class maritime research institute.

The National Center for Mediterranean Sea Research, which reportedly will be the only one of its kind in the Middle East, will be housed at Haifa U's Leon H. Charney School of Marine Sciences until it receives its own quarters.

Apart from Haifa U, the consortium consists of the Technion, Hebrew University, Bar-Ilan University, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, the Weizmann Institute, the Geological Survey of Israel and the Israel Oceanographic and Limnological Research Center.

Tel Aviv University is expected to join the consortium at some point in the future, Amos Gaver, Haifa U's vice-president of external relations, said in an interview last month.

Hailing the consortium as a breakthrough in the annals of Israeli academia, Gaver said it marks the first time universities in Israel have joined forces in one grand project.

"Sea research is very expensive, and no single university alone can afford it," he explained. "So it made sense to form a consortium."

The initiative for establishing the National Centre for Mediterranean Sea Research – which will focus on such areas as gas extraction, marine infrastructure and desalination – was conceived by the Israel Academy of Sciences.

In a report, the academy called for upgrading marine research in Israel. Its recommendations were adopted by the planning and budgeting committee of Israel's Council for Higher Education.

Gaver said that recently discovered natural gas fields in the Mediterranean off the coast of Haifa and Hadera underscore the need for a new cadre of Israeli marine researchers and scientists.

By all accounts, these fields contain an estimated 16 trillion cubic feet of gas, enough to meet Israel's requirements for about 100 years. Production will start in about five years.

But in order to extract this resource cost-effectively in an environmentally responsible way, Israeli companies must master the challenge of drilling in deep waters and building pipelines to transport the gas to land facilities.

Describing the Mediterranean as "a strategic asset," Haifa U president Aaron Ben-Ze'ev has said that Israel can achieve economic independence by developing its resources.

As he put it, "The resources hidden beneath its surface can significantly strengthen Israel's energy economy, can contribute to closing social gaps and can ultimately increase Israel's political strength at home and abroad."

Until a few years ago, Gaver noted, maritime research in Israel focused mainly on the Red Sea.

But with immense fields of natural gas having been found off Israel's coastline, the Mediterranean has assumed far greater importance, he said.

"Everyone understands that the Mediterranean needs to be further explored. And maybe, this new institute can be a pathway to peace with our Arab neighbours."

Until now, Gaver said, basic scientific research in Israel has concentrated on agriculture and security-related high-tech disciplines, such as electronics.

"This was the bread and butter of Israeli research," he said.

The National Center for Mediterranean Sea Research will shift some of the focus to maritime studies, which have suffered from neglect, and train a new generation of Israelis in maritime sciences.

It will be headed by Zvi Ben-Avraham, founding director of the Leon H. Charney School of Marine Sciences, the sole such institution in Israel.

Gaver, a former Jewish Agency emissary in the United States, said that $15 million will be needed to run the centre for the first three years. But additional funds will be needed to construct a separate building to house it.

Michael Meyer, director of fund-raising for Canadian Friends of Haifa University, expressed confidence that the centre will grow and prosper. "Israel has an ability to come from behind and move forward quickly."

Gaver suggested the centre may establish links with Halifax's Dalhousie University, which is currently in the process of forging academic relations with Haifa U.

Dalhousie has an internationally recognized Marine and Environmental Law Institute in its Schulich School of Law.

Last year, the Halifax Marine Research Institute was opened in the city's Maritime Museum of the Atlantic.

JTA

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs said last week it's satisfied with the explanation by Toronto Mayor Rob Ford that he doesn't know a white supremacist who had his photo taken with the city leader.

A picture of Jon Latvis with Ford was posted on the blog of Liberal party strategist Warren Kinsella, who titled the entry "The Toronto Mayor's Far-Right Friend."

Kinsella said Jon Latvis is a member of the neo-Nazi rock band RaHoWa, an acronym for "racial holy war."

The photo, which Kinsella found on Latvis' Facebook page and was still up last week, shows Latvis wearing a brown military uniform with the caption: "Me meeting with Toronto's Mayor, Rob Ford to get an endorsement for the Latvian Homeguard."

The picture was taken at a 2012 New Year's Levee at Toronto City Hall, Ford's office said in a July 26 statement, noting that he poses for many pictures at such events.

While the photo was being taken, Latvis requested a meeting with the mayor and the two men talked briefly this past March, but discussion was about public transportation, the mayor's office said.

The statement said that during both the levee and the meeting, Latvis identified himself by a different name.

"At no time was the mayor aware of allegations that this individual had made racist, hateful or otherwise offensive comments, nor were any such comments made during his meeting with the mayor," the statement said. "Mayor Ford is a strong supporter of Toronto's Jewish community and strongly deplores antisemitism in any form.

Commenting on his blog, Kinsella said that "the job of [the mayor's] staff is to ensure these types of incidents don't happen. Someone should lose their job over this."

The precious words they still cannot speak

Had the Palestinian Authority (PA) quietly and plainly said, "We support the plea of the families of the Israeli victims of the Munich Massacre for a moment of silence at the opening of the Olympic Games," how the world might now be changed.

Can one imagine how far the gesture would have gone to changing the mostly suspicious mood between the two peoples, to establishing a new footing for constructive Israeli-Palestinian relations, to changing the Palestinian paradigm of hero from terrorist to peacemaker and to pressuring the Israeli government into an act of obviously equal, demonstrably goodwill? But, alas, there was no such watershed gesture from the PA.

Rather, quite the opposite happened.

The Palestinian leadership thanked the International Olympic Committee for refusing to hold the brief commemorative ceremony. As reported by the PA's official news agency, Wafa, Jibril Rajoub, head of the Palestinian Football Federation, sent a letter to IOC chairman Jacques Rogge thanking him for not succumbing to the Israeli pleading.

"Sports is a bridge for love, connection and relaying peace between peoples. It should not be a factor for separation and spreading racism between peoples," Rajoub, a former PA security commander, wrote in his letter.

To ensure that the sporting world clearly understood the many lovely nuanced references to reconciliation in Rajoub's inclusivist, tolerant message to Rogge, a senior PA official in Ramallah added somewhat more bluntly, more typically true to the PA way, that the Palestinians were opposed to "Israel's attempts to exploit the Olympic Games for propaganda purposes."

In his effort to sound so positively pacifist in his outlook about the nature of sports, Rajoub somehow missed the rich irony that the cold-blooded murder of the 11 Israeli coaches and athletes at the Olympic Village in Munich 40 years ago by those Palestinian champions of sports and fair play was a bit contrary to the notion of sports as "a bridge for love, connection and relaying peace between peoples."

Not surprisingly, Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon condemned the PA for its characterization of the request for a moment of silence. "No, the murder of Israelis, because they are Israelis, is racist, not the request to dignify and honour them," Ayalon wrote on Facebook.

Palestinian leaders, such as Rajoub, are stuck in the stultifying muck of their own hatred. They cannot lift their feet from that black quagmire to take even the most tentative steps on a new path toward peace with the Israelis. To do that they must first speak the few but precious words: "The Israelis, too, belong in this part of the world, in their own state. We want to live side by side with them in our own state. Let's find a way to get there."

But they cannot. Until they do, their own people will continue to suffer.

CIJA's meeting with the PA

I almost choked on my coffee reading the headline "CIJA meets with the PA in Ramallah" (July 12). Since 2008, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (formerly the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy) has failed to react to anti-Israel activities in Yellowknife, which are supported by the local United Church and city councillors. In November 2010, I alerted CIJA that British MP and Palestinian supporter George Galloway would be speaking in Yellowknife. CIJA's response was that such events usually attract only those already on side, and unless people make them an issue, they pass under the radar. CIJA added that there isn't much that can be done except to present balanced programming in a community when there are interested parties willing to do so. An unprecedented, large crowd of 300 northerners went to hear Galloway spewing lies.

In June 2012, I alerted CIJA to help counter Yellowknife's fourth annual Focus on Palestine event. CIJA's response was that they have no control or impact over activities that people do, in any community, that do not contravene the law. CIJA said that much as CIJA doesn't approve of this group's programming, it is within the group's rights to hold the event. Where CIJA could intervene, they would.

Until CIJA reacts with authority to anti-Israel activities in Canada, it is incapable of acting as the "Canadian interlocutor between Israel and the Palestinian Authority to help restart the peace plan."

Community leadership

British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks writes eloquently in the Perspectives piece "Seven principles of Jewish leadership" (June 21). Columnist Lawrence Hart in "Applying principles of Jewish leadership" (July 5) elaborates further on these concepts. He writes that "sadly, though there are... exceptions, we see very little of this vibrant brand of leadership... that claim to represent the 'mainstream' of the Canadian Jewish community." I see it differently. As a volunteer who gives a great deal of time to our Jewish community, I see individuals rising above politics and focusing on the challenges at hand. I have worked with both lay leaders and professional staff whose actions and behaviour reflect the vibrant leadership style that Rabbi Sacks espouses. With education and transformative attitudes, I feel confident we have the ability to grow such positive leadership even further in our Canadian Jewish community.

Refugees' health care

I am writing to clarify my position on the article "Rabbis urge PM not to cut refugees' health care" (July 5). At the time the letter was written by the Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR) on the subject of Bill C-31, I was serving as president of the board. Given the overwhelming consensus of my colleagues on this issue, I affirmatively signed the TBR letter as a leader and representative of my group. The position of the Toronto Board of Rabbis was formulated from Jewish views on social justice and religious values. The Toronto Board of Rabbis comprises rabbis who represent the fullness of the religious denominational spectrum, including Reform, Reconstructionist, Conservative and Orthodox rabbis.

Day school education

In response to Maja Buium's letter, "Raising kids without day school," (July 5), kol hakavod for having raised committed young Jewish adults even though they attended public school. But statistics show that intermarriage for Jewish students attending public school is much higher than for those attending Jewish day schools. The content of Jewish day-school education reaches higher levels of education than camps, synagogues, part-time Hebrew school and trips to Israel can offer. Quality Jewish education should instil in our children pride in who they are, voiding any notion of assimilation. Education increases knowledge, intelligence and power. The knowledge should empower them to address intelligently and confidently those who want to convert them and antisemites on university campuses and elsewhere.

Ze'ev Jabotinsky's little-known anti-racist legacy

Seventy years since his death on Aug. 4, 1940

Rafael Medoff
JNS.org

The popular image of the Jews who took part in battles for black civil rights is of liberal activists and idealistic college students. Yet several important early civil rights efforts in the United States and South Africa were undertaken by – of all people – officers of the Irgun Zvai Leumi, the Jewish underground militia in British Mandatory Palestine.

This week's 70th anniversary of the passing of Ze'ev Jabotinsky – founder of the Irgun and Revisionist Zionism, the nationalist right-wing challenger to the more dominant Labour Zionism – is an occasion to reflect on Jabotinsky's little-known legacy of anti-racism.

Jabotinsky – who passed away on Aug. 4, 1940 (commemorated last week on the Hebrew calendar) – was arguably the most controversial Zionist leader of his era. He was dismissed as an alarmist when he predicted that European Jews would be engulfed by antisemitism. Socialist Zionists bristled at his preference for free market economics over Marxism. Because he promoted weapons training, he was denounced as a militarist. And because he believed the Arabs would never accept a Jewish state, he was branded a racist.

Those who read Jabotinsky's writings knew those labels did not do him justice.

He envisioned a Jewish state that would have a large Arab minority alongside its Jewish majority. Arabs would have full civil, political and cultural rights, including representation in parliament, and both Arabic and Hebrew would be official languages. Moreover, he argued that if there was a Jewish prime minister, there should be a deputy Arab prime minister (and vice versa).

Jabotinsky also had more than a passing interest in the question of race relations in the United States. Following a wave of race riots that erupted in the U.S. after black boxer Jack Johnson defeated his white opponent, Jack Jeffries, in 1910, Jabotinsky wrote in the Russian periodical Odesskie Novosti: "In the United States, the most free republic on earth, there are ten million citizens suffering a shocking lack of rights simply because of the colour of their skin… Theatres are closed to the black man, as are hotels, railway cars and schools. He is assigned special railway cars and narrow, separate compartments on trains. Schools for black children are cheaply constructed, inadequate and dirty. The political rights of the 'free and equal' black citizen are non-existent."

Ten years later, on a visit to the United States, Jabotinsky witnessed a Ku Klux Klan march in Texas. It reinforced his disgust at racism in America. In a letter to a friend at the time, he wrote that both Jews and blacks in the U.S. would soon find it necessary to physically defend themselves against their enemies.

So perhaps it should be not be surprising that officers of the Irgun stood up for black civil rights. In early 1940, Jabotinsky sent a number of young Irgun officers from Europe and Palestine to the United States to mobilize American support for the rescue of Jewish refugees and the creation of a Jewish state. Led by Hillel Kook, using the pseudonym Peter Bergson, they organized rallies, sponsored newspaper ads, lobbied in Washington and, in 1946, staged a Broadway play to rouse support for Zionism. The play, called A Flag is Born, played a surprising role in the fight against racial segregation.

Starring a young Marlon Brando, Flag had a successful 10-week run at Manhattan's Alvin Theater (today the Neil Simon Theater) and then hit the road. A planned performance at the National Theater in Washington, D.C., in early 1947 was relocated to Baltimore's Maryland Theater because the play's author, Ben Hecht, would not permit his works to be staged at theatres that, like the National, barred blacks.

When Hecht discovered that the Maryland Theater restricted blacks to the balcony, Bergson's group and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) teamed up to protest: the NAACP threatened to picket, and a Bergson official announced he would bring two black friends to sit with him at the play. The management gave in, allowing black patrons to sit wherever they chose. NAACP leaders hailed the "tradition-shattering victory" and used it facilitate the desegregation of other Baltimore theatres.

"I am proud," Hecht declared in a statement afterward, "that my play has been the instrument to break down one of the most un-American and undemocratic practices that has disgraced our country."

Meanwhile, Jabotinsky's followers took an interest in the fight against racism in South Africa, as well. Former Irgun commander Menachem Begin, leader of the opposition Herut party, paid his first visit to South Africa in the autumn of 1953. Hertzel Katz, an Israeli attorney who was a leader of the local branch of the Revisionist youth movement Betar, was on hand when Begin arrived in Durban. He recalls that Begin's hosts arranged for a rickshaw, the customary form of local transportation, to take him to a speaking engagement.

> On a visit to the United States, Jabotinsky witnessed a Ku Klux Klan march in Texas. It reinforced his disgust at racism in America

"Begin was appalled at the thought of a black man undertaking such a degrading task," Katz told JNS.org. "He refused to ride in the rickshaw."

Harry Hurwitz, who organized Begin's visit to South Africa and later became an aide to Begin as prime minister, once recounted another memorable incident from that visit. Shortly before one of his speeches in Johannesburg, Begin learned that, according to the law, blacks would not be permitted to sit in the same meeting hall as whites. Begin refused to take the stage unless blacks were admitted, Hurwitz said. After frantic, last-minute discussions with Jewish leaders, the local authorities relented and allowed blacks to attend Begin's lecture.

As for Katz, he divided his time between Betar and the struggle against apartheid. He and fellow Betar leader Kenny Gross were active in Helen Suzman's anti-apartheid Progressive party in the 1960s and ran for Parliament as Progressive candidates in 1965. Katz also assisted in the defence of a member of the Pan-Africanist Congress accused of fighting the apartheid regime. Katz said that Jabotinsky's essay Every Man a King, about the inherent dignity of every human being, inspired him to see a natural connection between the Jewish fight for independence and the blacks' struggle against apartheid.

From Baltimore to Johannesburg, Jabotinsky's followers recognized that, as Ben Hecht put it, "to fight injustice to one group of human beings affords protection to every other group."

Bulgaria's sobering lessons

There we go again. It's amazing how easy the nightmare returns. We can all relate to the Israeli travellers who arrived at the beachside resort in Bulgaria, and were focused on loading their luggage onto the bus. They were there to have a good time. They weren't representing Israel or the Jewish people. But to too many people worldwide, their mere existence, let alone their good time, represented a threat – and presented an easy target.

Gil Troy

The suicide bomber in Burgas, Bulgaria, last month brought so many of us back to the nightmarish days of the Palestinian war against Oslo and the peace process. That dastardly ability to turn the most innocent – and universal – of activities into a particularly Israeli or Jewish bloodbath is particularly unnerving. It sends the message that no one is safe, that nothing can be normal – even though these incidents are statistically insignificant and the chances of being caught in one at any given moment are infinitesimal. But that's the terrorist's perverse but brilliant logic – take the normal and make it feel threatening, while taking the rare and making it feel common.

Equally familiar, and depressing, was the world's reaction. The United Nations spokespeople condemned the "bombing" but couldn't use the "t" word, terrorism, because that would impute a moral judgment and would ruin their track record of cowardice and moral sloppiness. The Bulgaria massacre occurred the same week that even the United States was collaborating in the latest UN farce, a counter-terrorism conference that excluded Israel.

Underlying this dance is the decades-old blame game. Israel is deemed guilty of "occupation," therefore acts against Israel are not considered terrorism. But not labelling attacks on Israelis as terrorism enables it, even implicitly justifying violence against the most innocent of people doing the most innocuous of activities. No citizen of any country, no matter what the country does or does not do, should be subjected to the horrors the Israeli vacationers in Bulgaria endured. Such collective "punishment," which is actually mass targeting, is evil.

The terrorists and their enablers disprove the truism that terrorism doesn't work – it certainly worked for the Palestinians. For decades, the Palestinians bombed and kidnapped their way onto the world stage. Each terrorist attack prompted American tut-tuts about terrorism not working while raising the Palestinian profile. And yet, Palestinians must realize they've reached the point of diminishing returns.

The so-called "peace camp" or Zionist and non-Zionist "left" – both problematic labels – need a new mantra: being pro-terrorism is anti-peace. Terrorism undermines mutual trust, diminishes any kind of peace process, making compromise all the more difficult. Compromise cannot come amid moral outrage or evil acts. If all Israelis and Jews feel targeted, we'll go into a defensive crouch, rather than an expansive embrace.

By contrast, consider the sequence of the 1990s. In 1991, as Communism fell, the UN repealed its heinous "Zionism is racism" resolution. All of a sudden, the tone in the Middle East shifted. The road to Oslo began in New York, meaning the road to the boldest, most substantive attempt at Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation began with a shift in tone. This shift had to do with the war of words – delegitimization. Terrorism feeds off the delegitimization of Israel and dehumanization of Israelis. The war of words must end along with the Palestinians' total war against Israeli and Jewish civilians.

We hear a lot about Israel's "occupation" and "the settlements." More and more, even in Jewish circles, Israel is being blamed for the impasse with the Palestinians. But it's worth contemplating the last few years from the perspective of Burgas. Quiet is good, and not to be taken for granted. Maybe rather than constantly lamenting the Israeli-Palestinian stalemate, we can appreciate the stability that has emerged as a necessary precondition to more dramatic progress.

Too many Israelis, Palestinians and other onlookers want the quick win, the peace agreement achieved standing on one foot. But real progress will come incrementally. Trust must be built, not decreed. Stability is our friend, violence our foe. I for one was sorry not to hear Palestinian voices or even many voices on the left condemning the Burgas bombing. This was an easy opportunity to take a moral position and build trust. Their difficulty in even making this gesture demonstrates just how far the Palestinians – and their fellow travellers – still have to go.

Filling our jars

Stephen Covey in The Seven Habits book series tells the following story: An expert was speaking to a group of business students. He stood in front of the high-powered over-achievers and said, "Okay, time for a quiz." Then he pulled out a one-gallon, wide-mouthed mason jar and set it on a table in front of him. He produced about a dozen fist-sized rocks and carefully placed them, one at a time, into the jar.

When the jar was filled to the top and no more rocks would fit inside, he asked, "Is this jar full?"

Everyone in the class said, "Yes."

Then he said, "Really?" He reached under the table and pulled out a bucket of gravel. Then he dumped some gravel into the jar and shook it, causing pieces of gravel to work themselves down into the spaces between the big rocks.

Then he smiled and asked the group once more, "Is the jar full?"

By this time the class was onto him. "Probably not," one of them answered.

"Good!" he replied. And he brought out a bucket of sand. He started pouring in the sand and it went into all the spaces between the rocks and the gravel.

Once more he asked, "Is this jar full?"

"No!" the class shouted.

"Good!" he said again.

He grabbed a pitcher of water and poured it in until the jar was filled to the brim. Then he looked up at the class and asked, "What's the point of this illustration?"

One student raised his hand and said, "No matter how full your schedule is, if you try really hard, you can always fit some more things into it!"

"No," the speaker replied, "in fact, that's not the point. The truth this illustration teaches us is that if you don't put the big rocks in first, you'll never get them in at all. Remember – big rocks in first."

Once you have a jar full of big rocks, you can pour the pebbles over them, and the pebbles will fill in the spaces that the big rocks have left. What a life lesson for us: if we fill the jars of our lives with the pebbles, we will always struggle to find room for the big rocks. But if we fill the jars of our lives with the big rocks first, the pebbles will fill in the gaps.

I've been thinking a lot about this scenario lately. Summer seems like a time when we all are less anxious, less stressed. We seem to be more able let go of the many minor annoyances that have turned, in our mind, into major catastrophes. All year long, everything in our lives seems to be such a big deal. After awhile, we start to believe it really is a big deal. We run around trying to solve problems that have no solution, wanting to fix things that may not be able to be fixed. So much worry, so little time.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

This spiritual angst clutters up the mind and soul, and leaves little energy or room for the true drama of being alive. But in the summer, we often breathe more easily, giving ourselves the freedom to enjoy more, and to get to all the little projects we haven't had time for in the winter months.

They come beckoning with the lazy, long days of July and August. One of our projects that always seems to be on the back burner is the thoughtful process of being more aware of our lives, our limited time on this earth and our life priorities. The jar usually stands on the shelf, waiting to be the centre of our attention while we worry about car pools, groceries and which movie star is divorced again from which model. Filling our jars with tiny pebbles helps us ignore the calling of the bigger stuff – a handy excuse, an easy way out.

It feels as if we are forever rearranging the rocks but putting the small ones in first, time and again, and then wondering why there's no more room. We need to refocus our energy, and summer can be the right time to start. No school, vacation from work, the holidays not here yet. If the big rocks are the important things in our lives, let the summer freedom ask us what will fill up our jars next year.

A Jewish businessman in a Muslim land

Throughout the Middle East, Turkish firms are busy building roads, railway lines, bridges, dams, oil and gas pipelines, airports, hospitals, hotels, schools, petrochemical and power plants and waste water treatment facilities.

The Alarko group of 22 companies has been in the forefront of establishing commercial bridgeheads for Turkey in the region and has thereby played an integral role in bolstering Turkey's growing importance and influence in the Mideast.

With 6,400 employees and revenues of a little more than $1 billion last year, Alarko Holding is one of Turkey's biggest conglomerates, being active in 25 countries.

The man behind it, Ishak Alaton, a Turkish Jew from an old Istanbul family, is one of Turkey's most prominent businessmen.

Sheldon Kirshner in Istanbul

Now a spry 85, Alaton is honorary chairman of the board. "I've left the running of the company to professionals and the second generation," he said, referring to technocrats and family members such as his 49-year-old son, Vedat, the chair of the board, and his 51-year-old daughter, Leyla, who handles public relations.

Chuckling, he added self-deprecatingly, "I became obsolete and unnecessary. No one in the company really needs me anymore."

A high school graduate, Alaton co-founded Alarko in 1954 with his friend and partner, Uzeyir Garih, who was stabbed to death in a random crime on Aug. 25, 2001. "It was like a tile falling from a roof," he mused. "He was murdered by a common criminal, who stole his wallet and cell phone. He was in the wrong place at the wrong time."

"We were the two founders," he recalled in an interview in his office on the shores of the Bosphorus, the strait that separates Europe from Asia. "We started from scratch."

He and Garih, also a Jew, worked out of a single room after founding Alarko nearly 60 years ago, and methodically turned it into one of Turkey's leading enterprises. A public company, Alarko is listed on the Istanbul Stock Exchange, but 70 per cent of its shares are owned by the Alaton and Garih families.

"We began as a heating contractor," said Alaton, an open, friendly man who's fond of ushering visitors to his balcony to show off a stunning view of the high bridge that connects Europe to Asia's land mass. "We diversified into manufacturing fans, heating batteries and air conditioners. It was a slow, steady development. We are highly conservative and averse to risk. We're very cautious in our approach."

Alarko achieved its breakthrough as a general contractor when it built Turkey's embassy and a shopping mall in Moscow in the old Soviet Union.

These days, the countries of Central Asia comprise Alarko's largest market. Yet Alarko has also left its stamp in Arab countries such as Jordan (a gas storage plant), Algeria (a water treatment facility) and Morocco (a highway) and in Turkey itself (Istanbul's subway).

Alarko has conducted business in Iran, having built Iran's embassy in Moscow and a liquified natural gas storage plant in Bandar Abbas. The Iranian projects were finished in the early 1990s, when, he claims, Iran was not as rabidly anti-Israel as it is today. "We haven't done any work for Iran since then," he noted. "I wonder whether Iran would give us a contract today."

Prior to the eruption of the Iran-Iraq War in 1980, Alarko constructed bomb shelters for Iraq. With a smile, Alaton said that the then-Iraqi president, Saddam Hussein, knew he had awarded a contract to a Jewish-owned company.

Twenty five years ago, Alaton tried to enter the Israeli market, but the attempt fizzled. "We wanted to get involved, but it didn't work out."

Alaton's success as an entrepreneur can probably be traced back to his youth, when he promised himself he would be rich and famous.

In 1942, when Alaton was 15 years old, his father, Chaim, a prosperous importer of British yarn, lost his assets when the then xenophobic Turkish government levied a wealth tax on the richest citizens. The tax, imposed on fixed assets, affected Jews, Greeks and Armenians disproportionately.

"For Turkey's non-Muslim minorities, who were the principal targets of its arbitrary and discriminatory implementation, this law remains an indelible tragedy in their minds," writes Turkish historian Rifat Bali in The Varlik Vergesi Affair.

To Alaton, the tax was a crude and clumsy effort by the government to transfer wealth to the Sunni Muslim majority. "Thousands of Armenians, Greeks and Jews were bankrupted," he said. "The tax was totally anti-minority and anti-Jewish."

Since his father was unable to pay the exorbitant amount demanded, he was sent to Askaleh, a forced labour camp in eastern Turkey where about 2,000 non-Muslims were eventually housed.

"He was there for two winters," said Alaton. "We were impoverished by this tax. Our relatives in Ankara had to help us out."

When the tax was revoked in 1944, Alaton's father returned to Istanbul and opened a ladies' garment import company, but his spirit was broken.

"He was like a fish out of water, never the same man again. He was depressed and embittered over his mistreatment."

Alaton, however, did not hold a grudge, vowing to turn adversity into prosperity. After finishing school and completing military service, he went to Sweden to work as a welder, draftsman and industrial designer in a locomotive factory. While there, he met Olof Palme, a future Swedish prime minister whose Social Democratic ideas had a profound and lasting impact on him.

Alaton – a secular Jew whose autobiography was recently published in Turkey – is co-chair of the Turkish branch of the Open Society Foundations, which was created by financier George Soros to promote human rights, legal and social reform and democratic governance.

It comes as no surprise, then, that Alaton is unusually outspoken on topical issues.

He claimed that Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, a harsh critic of Israeli policy, is neither antisemitic nor anti-Israel. But Alaton is critical of the verbal onslaught that Erdogan unloosed on Israeli President Shimon Peres at the World Economic Forum in Davos two years ago. Alaton, however, thinks that Israel should not have used force in the subsequent Mavi Marmara incident, during which Israeli commandos killed nine Turks aboard this vessel trying to break Israel's naval blockade of the Gaza Strip in May 2010.

Ishak Alaton

Turning to another sensitive issue, he urged Turkey to issue a formal apology to atone for the massacre of Armenians in World War I.

He believes that Turkey should be admitted to the European Union, a process that seems stalled. "The EU," he said, "should not be a Christian club."

Job Katif makes pitch for those uprooted in Gaza withdrawal

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Tzuri Genish was a lieutenant colonel in the Israel Defence Forces when then-prime minister Ariel Sharon ordered the evacuation of all Jewish settlements in Gaza.

He was also a resident of Eli Sinai, a community in Gush Katif, the group of settlements in the southwest corner of Gaza that was subject to the disengagement order.

Like a good solider, he packed up and left, but when he saw the pain and dislocation experienced by his friends and neighbours, he decided he could no longer serve. Instead, he left the army, switched careers and devoted himself to helping them cope with the new circumstances of their lives.

Genish is a volunteer with Job Katif, an organization devoted to assisting former residents of Gush Katif and northern Shomron get back on their feet after the forced departures.

Genish was in Toronto last week along with his daughter, Moran, and Yitzchak Friedman, director of development for Job Katif. They met with about 50 potential supporters who had been brought together to hear about their post-relocation experiences.

It's been seven years since the Israeli army evacuated the unwilling residents of Gush Katif – an event Friedman described as this generation's Tisha b'Av (a reference to the destruction of the Jewish Temples in ancient times.)

Close to 9,000 people were forcibly removed from their homes and businesses and resettled across Israel. Although they received compensation, about 1,000 evacuees remain in difficult circumstances, Friedman said. "We were able to help over seven years the eager young ones, those willing to bend," he said. "We're left with the harder cases."

The remaining evacuees who are finding it difficult to cope were generally older, said Genish. Speaking through an interpreter, he said, "At 50, it's hard for them to change their careers."

The settlers were compensated with land, acknowledged Genish and Friedman, but it was barren and unserviced, permits to build were not granted and the government to this day has yet to make the land ready for habitation.

Genish works with the "harder cases," visiting them in their homes and trying to help them turn their lives around.

He brings credibility to the task that others cannot. "For three years, I did not work at all," said Genish, who served in the IDF as a paratrooper and engineer.

He gave up his military career – "I thought, how can I be in the army if the army is kicking us out" – and found it tough going afterward, relying on his military pension and living in tents, hotels, mobile homes and guesthouses.

Nevertheless, he was pursued by various businesses that offered him managerial positions, but instead he chose to volunteer with Job Katif.

"If I can help people like me, that's what I want to do," he said.

The evacuees – those who experienced what they call the "gerush" – are plagued with depression, lethargy and domestic difficulties. Husbands and wives fight, the divorce rate is high and the kids end up in trouble, often requiring therapy.

Genish said he goes "house to house and I sit with people in their dark houses, in depression, and I tell them, 'I was just like you and there is a way out of it. Hold my hand and we can do it.'"

"They trust him, that he feels their pain," Friedman said. "They meet and they cry together."

Tzuri Genish, right, his daughter Moran and Yitzchak Friedman were in Toronto to solicit aid for Job Katif.

Job Katif assists evacuees adjust to life outside Gaza. It provides counsellors, runs job programs, retrains them and provides loans to help people start businesses.

For every dollar Job Katif raises, the government of Israel contributes three more. That matching program runs out within a year, so the effort is on now to do as much as possible while government funds are still available, Friedman said.

But lots of people lose their jobs or are forced to move. Why is it so difficult for Gaza evacuees?

The nature of the disruption was greater for them, Friedman explained. "When people live together, work together, they feel like a family – a close-knit community. They were very successful people. They were successful exporters of flowers, vegetables, had homes and land. They were wealthy and healthy.

"But when people are over 50 and told to leave their homes, their jobs… they lost their community, their house, their jobs all in one huge loss. That is devastating," Friedman said.

Genish and his family left a home in Eli Sinai. Ironically, the three settlements in Eli Sinai were home to Israelis previously evacuated from Yamit, a town in the Sinai returned to Egypt as a term of the peace treaty. Adding to the irony was that it was Sharon who evacuated them to Eli Sinai, and then as prime minister he ordered them to leave their homes yet again, Genish said.

The rockets from Gush Katif into Israel started during the evacuation itself, Moran recalled. During a TV report about the rocket attacks, she recognized her neighbourhood as the source of the missiles.

That reality – that the withdrawal did not lead to peace or even a ceasefire, but to rocket attacks – has changed the minds of a lot of Israelis about the wisdom of the withdrawal, Moran said. "Before the disengagement, lots of people said what are you doing there?"

"Now, you don't hear that. People see that Gush Katif was important for the defence of Israel… People thought something good might come out of [the withdrawal]. Now people understand there's no peace, no security, no benefit came from it," she said.

Israeli wants Jews to take more ownership of Holy Land

Arieh King

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Arieh King started the Israel Land Fund (ILF) in 2007 to help Jews purchase real estate in Israel as a way to keep the Jewish state Jewish.

The idea for the fund was born when King realized "a need to disrupt the purchase of Jewish owned land in Israel by hostile, non-Jewish and enemy sources," the fund's website states.

"More and more Arabs and non-Jews are living and owning land all over Israel, from west Jerusalem to Tel Aviv and beyond," the ILF claims.

King, 38, was in Toronto last week to speak to the Jewish community and spread his message that it is essential for Jews in the Diaspora to begin owning land in Israel.

> 'Many people who purchase land, whether in the Galil or east Jerusalem, end up feeling a sense of ownership of Israel'

His grandparents made aliyah from Toronto and he was born on Kibbutz Alumim in the northwestern Negev just outside the Gaza Strip.

In a recent interview from Israel, just prior to his arrival, King said he wanted to make people understand that there is an ongoing concerted effort by Arab nations to purchase land in Israel via their agents – westernized Arabs holding U.S., British, and other passports – to erode the Jewishness of Israel on what he calls the "silent front" of land encroachment.

"It's about education. Many people who purchase land, whether in the Galil or east Jerusalem, end up feeling a sense of ownership of Israel and they come visit… and are proud they have the property," he said.

He noted that much of the purchasing being done now is by haredim and "Orthodox Zionists."

Rather than approach the haredim in Zionist terms, King said, the fund uses halachic arguments.

"You can be the biggest rabbi, but if you don't own actual ground, a field, an olive grove… you cannot keep shmittah [the commandment to leave the land fallow every seven years]," he said. Once this point was made, King said, there was a lot more interest in what he was doing.

While the haredim who buy land may not be motivated by Zionism, the purchase is still in line with the fund's overall mission to keep Israel Jewish, he said.

But there's a catch. Not just any Jew can buy property through the Israel Land Fund.

Any prospective purchaser is vetted by King to ensure that the new landowner will actively manage the parcel of land so that it cannot be claimed by Arab squatters over time, something that has happened before.

"We would connect the buyer with either a Jewish farmer or a property manager to help maintain and work the property. Nobody can buy and then just leave it" untended, King said.

He said in the last five years, the ILF has helped broker land purchases for increasing numbers of Diaspora Jews, but he would not disclose the amounts.

King said he's visited Toronto about five times and realizes that there are "big Zionist" communities in Canada that could help his cause.

"I believe if they were exposed to the needs of Israel [through the ILF] they would become more involved," he said. "Canadian Jews may be more quiet than Americans, but they're no less committed to the future of Judea and Samaria."

LES ANCIENS COMBATTANTS JUIFS DU CANADA
JEWISH WAR VETERANS OF CANADA

CANADIAN JEWISH WAR VETERANS

Toronto Post, has erected a

WAR MEMORIAL MONUMENT

to show Canadians, both Jews and gentiles, that Jews fought in three wars that Canada was involved in – World War I, World War II and the Korean War.

This monument will serve as a tool to inform and educate future generations of Jewish involvement in Canada.

In 1939, there were 169,000 Jews, including men, women and children, living in Canada. When the World War II started, 17,000 volunteers enlisted in the Canadian Armed Forces.

In relation to the Canadian population at the time, the percentage of Jewish servicemen and women in the Armed Forces was the highest of any ethnic group. Jews distinguished themselves in World War II, making heroic contributions to the outcome of the war, and some of them paid with their lives so that we can enjoy our freedom today.

We have worked toward the creation of this monument for many years. It's important for all of us – now and in the future – as it shows Jewish involvement in Canada's military.

Located on the grounds of the Canadian Jewish Federation Place (Lipa Green Building) at 4600 Bathurst St. in Toronto, the monument stands with a flag on each side – one Canadian and one Israeli.

The front of the monument is inscribed with the names of the 570 veterans who died in all three wars, and on the back of the monument, the names of 460 who served in any Allied armed forces, including partisans, are inscribed.

The monument has space for more names. Any veteran's relative can apply to have the names of fathers, mothers, uncles, brothers or any another war-veteran relative inscribed. We invite applications from across Canada.

There is a one-time cost of $75 with each application. For more information, please call 416- 636-1880, ext. 5181.

Photo exhibit portrays early Jewish immigrants to Toronto

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Picturing Immigrants in the Ward, a recently installed exhibit at the City of Toronto Archives, offers many tantalizing glimpses of Jewish, Italian and other recently arrived immigrants in the congested Ward neighbourhood of downtown Toronto as it existed from about 1905 to 1930. It focuses mainly on the era before the World War I.

The Ward was a mixed-use area of modest frame cottages, row houses, restaurants, factories, shacks, stables, junkyards and two- and three-storey commercial buildings with family apartments or businesses upstairs. It stretched to the west and north of Old City Hall as a landing area for the thousands of mostly European immigrants who arrived in the city each year.

Toronto's "foreign quarter," as long-established Torontonians sometimes called it, was bounded by University Avenue and College, Queen and Yonge streets. Its congested main streets and often muddy laneways and alleys were considered unhealthy, especially for the children who played in them from morning until evening, and who were often dirty, barefooted and ragged.

The Ward was a loosely zoned neighbourhood where almost anything seemed permissible, as evidenced in the array of photographs from newspapers, city reports, social agencies and other sources assembled at the exhibit.

Juvenile delinquency, the lack of suitable green space and the presence of contagious diseases, such as tuberculosis and diphtheria, were serious concerns of the day. Social service agencies, Jewish organizations and the Toronto Star sought to send children on summer vacations to the country – the Star's Fresh Air Fund was established to do just that – or at least on picnics to Toronto Island.

A 1910 photo-spread in the Toronto World showed a house surrounded by crates of bottles piled high all around its outer walls, partly obscuring the windows. The caption read, "Chestnut Street home where sunlight is not considered a boon compared to the profits of traffic in empties."

Toronto's works department took some 3,000 photographs in the Ward around 1911, hoping to document the overcrowded and unsanitary conditions. The city's chief health officer used the photos to document hundreds of health-code violations.

One photo showed a three-storey tenement building that was inhabited by six families who shared a single outdoor privy with the factory hands who worked on the top floor, 40 people in all. The building's only source of water was an outdoor tap that sometimes froze in winter.

A photograph of a grocery store and Hebrew bookstore with their names in Yiddish in the windows are among several pictures that capture the flavour of the growing Yiddish-speaking district.

Although the streets of the Ward were dotted with synagogues and storefront shtiblach, none appear in the exhibit. But it includes two early 20th-century wedding portraits from the Goldenberg and Bochner families respectively, loaned from the Ontario Jewish Archives. Even working class people with hardly a nickel to spare, it seemed, always had a good set of clothes at the ready in case of a family marriage.

Wrapped along the walls of the lobby of the City of Toronto Archives on Spadina Avenue below Davenport Road, the exhibit consists mostly of photographs but also features maps, pages from official reports, sections of newspaper stories and a separate display about the growth of Chinatown on Elizabeth Street.

It also includes four large-scale photographs by Susan Dobson, which depict the area in recent times. The gritty and blighted cityscape of 70 to 100 years ago has vanished, and the neighbourhood's human scale has also disappeared, obliterated by today's towering megalithic superstructures, such as hotels, hospitals and City Hall. Thanks to decades of unrelenting urban renewal, the former character of the Ward has been erased almost completely.

The curators' insistence that the exhibit is really about "how photography shaped ideas about central and eastern European immigrants in early 20th-century Toronto" seems misguided. This show is really about a city neighbourhood of tremendous importance to our collective history that has been shockingly allowed to disappear, almost without a trace.

Picturing Immigrants in the Ward continues until May 2013, and admission is free. See www.toronto.ca/archives for more details.

Festival offers family-friendly entertainment

The festival, co-produced with Toronto's Harbourfront Centre, celebrates the diversity of Jewish music, art and artists from places around the world. This year's lineup includes more than 200 artists, some of them from Uganda, India, Central Asia, Argentina, Italy, Mexico and Australia.

Ashkenaz offers family-friendly entertainment, including storytelling, crafts and interactive workshops and performances.

This year's festival features two of North America's pre-eminent family entertainers, Sharon Hampson and Bram Morrison, best known as two-thirds of the iconic trio Sharon, Lois and Bram.

"Sharon and I are excited to be performing our usual family sing-along with a lot of familiar songs from our repertoire from previous years," Morrison said. "We're going to be adding a certain number of songs that represent our Jewish background, such as the well-known and eternally beloved I'm a Little Latka, Der Rebbe Elimelech, Oy Vey, Oy Vey and more. We will be having our small but powerful band with us through the entire concert, and we also have plans to add some of the klezmer musicians who are playing with other bands to our show for a nice full freilich finale with real klezmer style."

The word "klezmer" is derived from the Hebrew words klay (instrument) and zemer (music) and means "instrument of song." The music has its roots centuries ago, in the shtetlach of eastern Europe, where it was originally meant to intimate the voice or music of the cantor in the synagogue.

The non-traditional klezmer music of present day is influenced not only by its eastern European roots, Gypsy melodies and Balkan music but also by Israeli horahs, jazz and the folk music of other lands.

The lead-up to the festival begins on Aug. 26 at the 918 Bathurst Centre for Culture, Arts, Media & Education, at 918 Bathurst St., with a community-wide workshop day with Shadowland Theatre. Led by Ashkenaz staff and Shadowland interns, participants will create a craft and celebrate their handiwork by joining the festival's parade.

Programming goes dark on the afternoon of Friday, Aug. 31, for Shabbat, and will recommence early evening Saturday with performances at a dozen different stages going on simultaneously.

Rabbi Gershom Sizomu and his brother, JJ Keki, featured performers at the festival, are from Uganda. Their tribal name, the Abayudaya, means "people of Judah." The Abayudaya live in rural villages in eastern Uganda and trace their Jewish origins to the turn of the 20th century.

"Music has long been a motivating force for religion in Africa. The rhythm of drums, used to call people to prayer and an integral part of religious worship, is the heart of African music. I see our opportunity to reach people through our music at the Ashkenaz Festival and leading of the havdalah ceremony as a continuation of our tikkun olam efforts," Rabbi Sizomu said.

The signature Ashkenaz Festival Parade, on Labour Day, is inspired by folkloric characters, superstitions and stories from Jewish and Yiddish culture. It features musicians, artists and stilt walkers. "The parade's community band is open to anyone who can play an instrument and wants to participate and be inclusive of the musical delights led by a core of the festival's musicians," Stein said.

Hard work lies ahead

In a few short weeks, we'll begin the month of Elul. It's the month before Rosh Hashanah, and generally we're aware that it's the month of repentance. But what does that mean, and what is the process?

Repentance in Judaism is the culmination of a number of steps. Elul marks the first of those steps. Over the course of the year, we go about our business and sometimes we do something we regret. We might take a minute to evaluate what we can do to fix it or how we can quickly move on from there. If we feel guilty about it, we can console ourselves with the thought that we, like everyone else, are simply human. Being human seems to be the catch-all approach to much of our poor judgment.

The month of Elul sections off an entire month for us to ask ourselves why we keep repeating patterns that are of no benefit to us or anyone else. Why do we respond the way we do whenever we're in a particular environment? Repentance is the outcome of asking these fundamental questions. Being only human is our starting point, not our final conclusion.

To engage in Jewish repentance we must employ Jewish vocabulary: repentant and sinner. These are useful subcategories within being human – we just don't like those words.

In today's society, being called a sinner is a loaded term that speaks of religious fundamentalism. Yet in Hebrew, the terminology speaks volumes to clarify the intended word. The Hebrew word "chet" was an archery term that meant you missed the bull's-eye. It doesn't make you evil or an infidel. It simply means you must improve your aim next time.

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

Elul is the month where we can acknowledge that we often express ourselves in ways that miss the target. That makes us all sinners. Before we recognize that fact and accept that part of ourselves, we'll be unable to engage in repentance of any kind. While we excuse our behaviour as just being human, we block ourselves from understanding that we must always continue to hone our skills and do better with our expressions and acts of loving kindness.

Engaging Jewishly in the month of Elul is hard work. We must identify what target we were intending to hit and how close we came. We must figure out how to readjust our aim and find the resources to give it another go. It's not simply giving out blanket apologies to anyone we meet, but recognizing that we're doing this because we sinned and we're growing and improving.

In the Talmud, Rabbi Abahu states that "the place where people who repent stand can never be reached by those who have never sinned." Of course, it's impossible to live and never sin, but it's certainly possible to live in ignorance of that fact. There's no potential in simply being human, but there's infinite potential in acknowledging that we have sinned.

Striking pay dirt at Tel Huqoq

My role as president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto has given me the opportunity to act as a catalyst for some worthwhile endeavours.

Among these was the Dead Sea Scrolls Exhibit recently held at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM). Another event was the Olive Oil Project involving the consuls of some of the major countries around the Mediterranean, which was capped off by a gala evening at the ROM and an academic conference at St. Michael's College.

Out of the Olive Oil Conference grew another project that has been of particular interest to me involving Jewish-Italian friendship. This project has had the strong support of the outgoing consuls-general of Italy and Israel.

As a young boy growing up in Toronto's second Little Italy running along St. Clair Avenue West, many of my closest friends were Italian immigrants with whom I formed a natural bond. When I got married, it was to a girl who was born in Trastevere, the Jewish district in the heart of Rome. As a result, I developed an affinity for most things Italian.

When speaking to Gianni Bardini, the Italian consul general in Toronto, he told me of how a number of prominent Italian builders and developers had told him how they had gotten their start thanks to the help of Jewish associates. We thought that it would be a great idea to highlight the close cooperation of the two communities in their adopted homeland. Thus began the Jewish-Italian Friendship Project.

Throughout various meetings with representatives of our two communities, we were thinking of a worthwhile project that we could take on that would celebrate the partnership and achievements of our two communities. It was while contemplating this task that I received a call from Prof. Michael Chazan, director of U of T's Archaeology Centre, asking for my help in getting U of T involved in a new excavation to be headed by Prof. Jodi Magness of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. (Coincidentally, Magness also happens to be a world authority on the Scrolls who was brought to the ROM as part of the ROM's blockbuster exhibit.)

Chazan's call was a gift from heaven, for at one stroke I had found the ideal project that we could adopt to celebrate Jewish-Italian friendship.

We had a Roman period site in Israel in the heart of the Galilee where Jesus had spent his early ministry. It was a fitting symbiosis of our two cultures. Now, a year and a half later, the dig has provided us with a wealth of riches, including the just-announced discovery of a synagogue with a spectacular mosaic on its floor.

We look forward to having Magness come to Toronto in the early fall to tell us all about her exciting finds in a public lecture to be held at the ROM.

Beginning before the beginning

Rabbi Micah Streiffer

"Let's start at the very beginning," goes the famous Broadway line. And it seems logical. But in Judaism, the beginning isn't "a very good place to start." You have to start long before that.

Everyone knows that transitioning from one activity to another can be hard. Anyone who has ever tried to get a three-year-old to leave the playground knows that you can't just announce "Time to go," and expect a clean break! You have to leave time for questions ("Why do we have to go?") and negotiations ("Just five more minutes!") and rituals ("As soon as I go down the slide…").

It's not only kids who need time to transition. We adults are the same way. You can't just step onto the hockey rink and start to play; you need a warm-up to get your body ready. You can't just show up in shul and start to pray; you need the opening songs to get your soul ready. And you can't just jump into a festival; you need a period of preparation and transition to prepare your soul.

For just that reason, Judaism has a series of mechanisms to help us mark the transitions from one liturgical moment to another. The key is to "begin before the beginning." That's why, for example, it's traditional to start building a sukkah right after Yom Kippur, in order to make the transition from the solemn Day of Atonement to the joy of Sukkot. Similarly, the obscure tradition of placing a jar of oil in the sukkah bridges the gap from the harvest festival to the wintertime festival of lights.

Of all the Jewish holy days, Yom Kippur requires the most spiritual preparation. For that reason, the Day of Atonement comes along with an extensive period of transition that begins – believe it or not – right now. This Shabbat, seven weeks before Rosh Hashanah, marks the beginning of a time of reflection that will lead us to the month of Elul and ultimately to the High Holy Days.

Rabbinic Reflections

It is referred to as Shabbat Nachamu, the Sabbath of Comfort, because on this Shabbat we read the first of seven Haftarot of consolation. These seven messages from the prophet Isaiah are intended on the one hand to console us following Tisha b'Av, the date on which we commemorate the destruction of the ancient Temple. They're also intended to help us get into the frame of mind necessary to the hard work of Yom Kippur – of examining our lives and vowing to do better. After all, just like our children, we can't make the transition without questions ("How can I do better next year?") and negotiations ("Just give me the will power.") and rituals ("Kol nidrei v'esarei…").

Even in the midst of summer – at our cottages, summer camps and barbecues – may we remember to "begin before the beginning." May this season of preparation bring comfort and renewal, and give us the strength and honesty we will need when we stand together seven weeks from now.

Talmud: starting all over again

The cycle has begun again. The cycle is known as daf yomi, in which a double-sided page of the Talmud is studied daily until this classic work is completed in 7-1/2 years. Whether you are a beginner and want to learn more about the Talmud or an advanced student looking for online resources, read on.

Part of the Talmud-learning experience is grasping the large volume in your hands while following along with your teacher. Two monumental publishing initiatives that have made the Talmud more accessible are translations and elucidations by Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz [http://bit.ly/dafyomi22] and by Artscroll Publishers. Artscroll celebrated the completion of its 73-volume translation with a presentation of a set to the Library of Congress. [http://bit.ly/dafyomi30]

You can also read the entire contents of the Talmud on your computer screen along with audio commentary, thanks to sites such as e-daf.com as well as DafYomi.org, Daf Notes [http://bit.ly/dafyomi23] and YUTorah Online. [http://bit.ly/dafyomi24] And to help you remember what you've learned, DafYomiReview.com lets you program in a cycle of automatic Talmud review.

I began this column by recommending Eliezer Segal's Talmud site. Prof. Segal has also completed studying all 2,711 pages of the Talmud. Since his studies took several years and followed him around the world, Segal now associates particular sections of the Talmud with the milestones of his own life: "One tractate conjures up associations with the Shiite village in Lebanon where I studied it during my Israeli army reserve duty; another page I plodded through while waiting in a queue at Disneyland; still another I read just before my first job interview at the University of Calgary. I imagine that these personal associations will be forever attached to their respective sugyas (topics)." [http://bit.ly/dafyomi25]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

The next time you're standing in line at Disneyland and have forgotten your Talmud, no problem. Just take out your iPhone, run the Daf Yomi app and you'll never go wrong. (This is an excellent, free app. The interface is in Hebrew only, but it links to classes in English, Hebrew and Yiddish.) [http://bit.ly/dafyomi26] Both Steinsaltz [http://bit.ly/dafyomi27] and Artscroll have announced digital versions of their translations of the Talmud. [http://bit.ly/dafyomi28]

By the time you read this, the 12th cycle of daily study of the Talmud will be underway. In a spirited essay, "The Day After! Making a Commitment to Daf HaYomi!" Rabbi Moshe Meir Weiss says it's not too late to join in. He addresses the usual excuses (I don't have the time. I'll forget everything. I'm too young. I'm too old.)

Rabbi Weiss concludes, "I can guarantee you it will change your life for the better in countless ways… In the merit of our Torah study, may HaShem bless us all with long life, good health, happiness, and everything wonderful!" [http://bit.ly/dafyomi29]

Tzohar tries to curb circumcision negativity

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV – In response to the rising number of non-observant Israeli couples foregoing ritual circumcision, the Tzohar Rabbinical Organization has introduced a secular-friendly brit milah program.

"Beyond the physical aspects of the brit milah which parents naturally find stressful, we know that secular couples in particular can find the rituals associated with this process to be confusing and even alienating," Tzohar chairman and co-founder Rabbi David Stav said in a statement about its new program.

Feature

"The goal is therefore to provide parents with an informed and compassionate partner in this process so they can appreciate the importance of this historical Jewish custom."

Every year, more and more secular couples opt out of circumcising their sons. Aware of the cracks in consensus on circumcision in Israel, Rabbi Stav said there are two key reasons for this trend.

"One, there were rumors about damages caused to the baby during circumcision and that's why many parents were afraid," he told The CJN.

"And two, many secular Israelis question themselves as to why, after throwing away all the other mitzvot, the only custom they've kept is something that looks like a pagan ceremony. Therefore we wanted to open our gates, to expose them to the perspectives on the brit milah."

Rabbi Stav said Tzohar decided to act before it was too late.

"This is a tradition which has defined our people for thousands of years and any threat to its continuation, particularly here in the modern Jewish State, should be confronted before the numbers of Jewish boys being denied a brit milah grows to even more troubling proportions," he says.

The new program certifies mohels (ritual circumcisers) in collaboration with the Israeli Health Ministry and the Israeli rabbinate. The mohels also undergo additional training through Tzohar that focus on making sure that the parents feel best informed about the experience that their newborn sons will undergo.

"Tzohar has defined itself by our devotion to preserving the Jewish character of the State of Israel and our willingness to serve as real partners in the most exciting times in people's lives. We aim to show that Jewish tradition and Halachah are ideals which can be practiced with compassion and love – whether it's Jewish marriage or entering our sons into the covenant of Abraham," Tzohar executive vice-president Nachman Rosenberg said.

Another trend among secular Israelis who do decide to circumcise their sons is choosing a doctor instead of a mohel. Not feeling a need for religious meaning, many new parents prefer a sterilized doctor's office instead.

"We know about this phenomenon and we have doctors among our mohelim as well," Rabbi Stav said.

"All our mohelim are trained to do circumcision. They are even more trained than doctors because they're not doing surgeries or treating sick people as well. They are experts in this specific field. But we understand this comment and we have mohelim that are licensed to act as a doctor and mohel."

Tzohar is best known for its program that has facilitated more than 35,000 Jewish marriages free-of-charge for Israeli secular couples. Tzohar was founded 15 years ago by Zionist rabbis who wanted to bridge the gap between religious and secular societies by creating inclusive and user-friendly interfaces to issues of Jewish law that secular Israelis are legally required to confront in their daily lives.

Although Tzohar rabbis will officiate weddings for free, the brit milah program costs NIS 1,000.

"It's not like weddings, where the service was free because rabbis who were on the state's payroll were also charging couples. People that do circumcisions, it's their job, and we cannot expect them to do it for free," he explained.

"But we can expect them to charge reasonable rates and visit the baby before and after the circumcision."

According to the new program, Tzohar mohels will dress in special white robes, will provide receipts for the service and will be available during the baby's recovery period.

"Undergoing a brit is a chance for every Jew to experience the deep connection between himself and the Jewish people and the Creator," the rabbi said.

"Tzohar feels privileged and obligated to work with parents on this important occasion that ushers a newborn into Judaism, and to do so in a way that leaves the best impression in years to come."

Shelter for homeless youth honours Temple Sinai

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Temple Sinai Congregation has received an Eva's Platinum Heart Award for its involvement with Eva's Place, a shelter for homeless young people that provides services to help them reconnect with their families and live independently.

Jeff Yolleck, co-chair with Marilyn Cukier of Temple Sinai's social action committee, said that through projects related to the shelter, congregants have become "better aware of what's really going on in the world, and how in simple ways we can make a huge difference."

In addition to providing personal care items such as toothpaste and shampoo, Temple Sinai donates fresh, local, organic produce from its Community Supported Agriculture (CSA) program, which runs from May to October.

"There were times we filled the car to the roof with produce [including] lettuce that was cut that morning," Yolleck said. "For the young people there, it really is so nice to get food that's that great. It's different than what they can do with their budget."

Helen McGarry, centre, of Eva's Place and Eva's Satellite, presents an Eva's Platinum Heart Award to Lori Swartz and Jeff Yolleck of Temple Sinai.

Some of the produce is donated by the Cutting Veg, which provides the produce for the CSA. As well, if members miss their weekly pickup, it is donated to Eva's place.

Also, Yolleck said, probably four out of five CSA members direct their share to Eva's Place when they go on vacation.

He added that the congregation was "deeply honoured" to get the award.

Earlier this year, Rabbi Daniel Mikelberg, one of the rabbis at Temple Sinai, worked with social-action committee members to host a chocolate seder at Eva's Place.

Yolleck said he didn't know of any Jewish youth at the shelter, but that regardless of their backgrounds, "young people attending could find that our story of seeking freedom may parallel their own personal journeys."

On Aug. 22, from 2:30 to 6:30, photographers from Eva's Place will have their framed artwork for sale at the temple's CSA.

Blind Israeli golfer wins fourth world championship

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Shimshon Levi likes to joke that he's known Zohar Sharon since he was eight days old and Sharon attended his bris back in Israel.

That was 51 years ago, and today the two remain the closest of friends. Sharon jokes they're practically married, although the 16 hours a day they spend together is probably more than most married couples.

Their friendship is cemented by a mutual devotion to the game of golf.

Sharon is the golfer, but Levi wears multiple hats: he's Sharon's caddy, course manager, swing coach and, most importantly, his eyes. Together, they have elevated Sharon's game to the elite level. Sharon recently captured the 2012 World Blind Golf Championship at the Truro Golf Club in Nova Scotia. The win marked the fourth time he's been the world's number 1 blind golfer.

Last week, the two were in Toronto to take part in the 15th fundraising golf tournament sponsored by Beit Halochem Canada. Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel. The organization raises money on behalf of 51,000 disabled Israel Defence Forces veterans, which includes Sharon, who was blinded while serving in the IDF.

He credits his success in golf to the support he's received from Beit Halochem. Not only was it instrumental in his rehabilitation, it helped him discover his passion, golf, and gave him the resources to train. Even today, it flies him out to tournaments well in advance so he and Levi can familiarize themselves with the courses, he said.

Sharon, 59, captured the World Blind Golf Championship with rounds of 118 and 98, for a total score of 216, six strokes better than the second-place finisher from Italy. The week before, he won the Canadian Blind Open at the Mountain Golf and Country Club in Truro.

Sharon was under the weather for the first round of the world championship, but felt better on the second day. A 17 handicapper, Sharon shaved 10 strokes off his score on Day 2.

Playing for Israel and acting as a de facto goodwill ambassador is a weighty responsibility, Sharon said through an interpreter. "If I didn't have to carry Israel on my back, I would have a lot less pressure."

"He feels he'd do better if he was just Zohar Sharon," the interpreter explained.

"I'm not afraid to not win," Sharon continued, "but I don't want to disappoint

Beit Halochem. They put so much effort into what I do. Without Beit Halochem, I would not be a champion."

Sharon said he's generally well accepted at international tournaments, but "you always feel the negativity from somewhere."

He recounted the story of a tournament player who told him "he doesn't understand why he doesn't like Israelis. He said he must have gotten it in his mother's milk.

"But he [now] finds Israelis are fine people, and then he bought [me] a beer," Sharon said.

He remains a proud Jew at tournaments, and if he's asked to remove his hat, he's got a kippah handy to keep his head covered.

His practice regime is gruelling – he plays every day, except Shabbat.

When he's asked what parts of his game he'd like to improve, he smiles and mentions putting.

"There are two people and one ball," he said. "It's up to Shimshon to direct me."

Sharon's reliance on Levi is pretty much total. On every shot, Levi lines up Sharon's club behind the ball, describes the hole, the yardage, the obstacles. On putts, which require touch and the ability to read greens, Levi's input is crucial.

"The more we learn to work together, the more there's improvement," Sharon said.

As Levi puts it, "You feel him every day. Every day I see what he does. You feel what he thinks. We play a lot. I know him."

Remarkably, Levi never took golf lessons and Sharon does not have a pro instructing him. But Levi's been in the game so long that he recognizes when Sharon is off his game. "In the warm-up, I see what he's doing, right or wrong," he said.

Becoming an elite golfer took a lot of hard work, but Sharon was determined right from the start, Levi said. "He wanted to be a champion" and he worked at it from morning to night.

"He said, 'Maybe it will take five years, but I'll be a champion,'" Levi recalled.

In fact, he won his first tournament, in Scotland, about a year and a half after he took up the sport.

"When he started, it was very hard. But if it's easy, it's not so sweet," Levi said.

Not only has Sharon excelled on the world stage, he's also served as an inspiration to a new generation of disabled golfers in Israel. Around 20 veterans have taken up the sport at Beit Halochem. Some have missing limbs, some play seated and some require special carts.

Event raises $80,000 for Beit Halochem

Last week's charity event at the Copper Creek Golf Club is expected to raise around $80,000 for Beit Halochem Canada, said Lisa Levy, the organization's executive-director. The money will go to Beit Halochem centres in Israel, which will fund rehabilitation and sports programs for disabled veterans and those wounded severely in terrorist attacks.

Although it's a major event on the Beit Halochem calendar, the golf tournament comes second in raising money to the organization's annual cycling trip in Israel.

This year's five-day event is scheduled for October and will see Beit Halochem supporters cycling from the Golan to Jerusalem in the company of disabled veterans.

So far, about 50 riders have signed up for the tour, most of them Canadian. Last year's event raised more than $350,000. Cyclists are asked to raise at least $2,500 each, with 35 corporate sponsors kicking in anywhere from $2,500 to $18,000.

The event allows riders to cycle through Israel, help a great cause and meet the veterans they are assisting, Levy said.

Canada, Israel call for R&D proposals

Compiled by CJN Staff

OTTAWA — Representatives of the Canadian and Israeli governments declared last week that both their countries are open to collaborative business ventures in science and technology.

They vowed to "deliver on their commitments made during the Canada- Israel Technology Innovation Summits held in 2010 and 2011. Canadian and Israeli companies as well as their collaborators may now submit their proposals for research and development projects in areas of mutual priorities which include water, renewable energy, and brain-related research," the National Resource Council of Canada (NRC) said last week.

Avi Hasson, chief scientist at Israel's Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, and NRC president John McDougall, met July 24 in Ottawa.

"We look forward to working together on more collaborative projects that will benefit our economy and will strengthen our industry," McDougall said. "Canada and Israel share common strength in industry and technology fields, and we are confident that this call for proposals will result in tangible benefits for both countries."

Hasson said the agreement will help both countries address "pressing challenges" in today's world.

"We are confident that this new cooperation is an important addition to the existing support mechanisms and will intensify and deepen the methods of technology collaboration between Canada and Israel and create new opportunities for our industries," he said.

The collaboration between the countries is being implemented jointly through the NRC and MATIMOP – the Israeli Industry Centre for R&D.

Proposals are being considered through EUREKA, which the NRC describes as a "European-based network raising productivity and competitiveness of business through technology."

Eligible projects will be funded by both Canada and Israel.

Campers raise awareness for Sudbury food bank

Rita Poliakov
Special to The CJN

SUDBURY — For Emma Csillag, summer camp isn't just about swimming and kayaking. It's about giving back.

That's why she joined more than 100 Camp Solelim campers and staff on July 15 as they marched through the streets of Sudbury, Ont., to raise awareness for the city's food bank.

"Tikkun olam is a Jewish value. It means healing the world," Csillag said at the Sudbury Food Bank Walkathon. "These are core values of our religion. It's nice to see we can reach out to people."

While the camp has raised awareness about issues around the world, Csillag, a head staff member, wanted campers to make a difference locally.

"They can see the change they're making," she said.

Located about a four-hour-drive from Toronto within the boundaries of Greater Sudbury, Camp Solelim is a six-week leadership camp for 14- and 15 year-olds. It was founded in the 1960s and has stayed in the community ever since.

"Our camp is here. It's been here since [the 1960s]. It'd be really nice to work locally," Csillag said.

The head staffer has wanted to work with the food bank for years now, especially since the summer months are often the hardest for food banks. While residents are used to holiday can and packaged food drives, they often get distracted in the summer.

For Sophie Vaisman, a 14-year-old camper, the cause is an important one.

"It's good to raise awareness," she said. "[There are] so many people who are hungry."

While the campers didn't raise funds and had little food to bring from camp, they carried signs with startling statistics, such as the fact that 15 per cent of food banks run out of food during the year.

"A lot of people will see us. Hopefully there's a lot more done [about this]," Vaisman said.

Jenna Goldberg, a second-year Solelim staffer, said she likes the idea of helping a local charity.

"We like to encourage tikkun olam, the idea of giving back to the community. In the past, we've done bigger things, like a walk for Darfur, but we felt like doing something [local]."

She added that staff thought "it would benefit the kids. For them to be a part of this, it encourages them to do the same back home."

Rather than helping an organization on the other side of the world, campers can see the community they're supporting, Goldberg said. "We're giving money to huge organizations, but we don't see where the money goes."

Dan Xilon, the food bank's administrator, was impressed by the campers.

"Apparently, the camp wants to raise awareness about hunger issues. They know the food bank is often empty in the summer," he said.

"I think it's special. [The walkathon] was totally generated by them. They came along and decided [to help]. I think it bodes well for the young people."

Feds, province rescue human rights museum

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Supporters of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights (CMHR) – whose outer shell is nearly complete – are breathing a sigh of relief now that the federal and provincial governments have come forward with long-term loans and loan guarantees.

While its physical structure will be finished next year as planned, the museum faced the distinct possibility that its doors would not open as planned in 2014 –already a year behind the museum's original building schedule – due to a cash shortfall of about $35 million.

It had looked quite likely that the opening could have been delayed indefinitely.

When the late media mogul Israel Asper first proposed the project in 2003, the plan called for a $200-million structure to be completed in three to four years. The most recent projection put the final construction bill at $351 million.

The Canadian Museum for Human Rights is currently under construction in Winnipeg. [Myron Love photo]

So far, the federal government has contributed $100 million toward building the first national museum outside Ottawa, and it has pledged to provide $21.7 million a year in operating costs. Last November, the government rejected a request from the museum's board for more funding.

The province has provided $40 million for construction costs, while the city of Winnipeg has kicked in $20 million.

"We are very excited about the governments' proposed solutions to our budget shortfall," said Kathi Neal, director of communications and marketing for the Friends of CMHR. "That will allow us to open as scheduled in 2014 and gives us cost certainty."

Under the terms of the agreement, Ottawa is providing the museum with an interest-free loan that will be repaid through savings in the museum's operating budget and from revenues after the museum is opened. The province is kicking in with a loan guarantee for the Friends of the CMHR.

The Friends group – led by Asper's daughter, Gail Asper – has generated $130 million in private donations and is working toward raising another $20 million.

The total amount of the loans and loan guarantees could be as high as $70 million, sources told the Winnipeg Free Press.

The second vexing question for the CMHR, after financial concerns, has been an ongoing campaign by certain elements in the Canadian Ukrainian community – led by Lubomyr Luciuk and his Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association – for the Holodomor to be given equal space with the Holocaust in the museum.

The Holodomor was the death by starvation in 1932-33 of an unknown number of Ukrainians – estimates run from 1.8 to 12 million – who resisted Soviet leader Josef Stalin's farm collectivization program.

The original plan called for a separate gallery for the Holocaust, based on the role it played in the postwar development of international human rights bodies and legislation. The Holodomor was to be included as part of a gallery that would cover several other examples of mass murder.

The museum hopes that a memorandum of understanding signed in early July between Stuart Murray, president and CEO of the CMHR, and Victor Didenko, CEO of the Memorial in Commemoration of Famines' Victims in Ukraine, will put an end to that controversy.

"The agreement pledges that our organizations will collaborate to promote human rights though education and example," said Angela Cassie, the museum's director of communications and external relations.

"By raising awareness of the Holodomor, the genocide-famine created by the Soviet Union in Ukraine in 1932-33, we hope to remind people the importance of breaking the silence on human rights issues," Murray said in a statement.

"This partnership will help bring the story of the Holodomor to a wider audience, to the benefit of generations to come."

Shul's singles committee serves the community

Michelle Bitran
Intern

For many single adults, it can be difficult to meet new people. The Shaar Shalom singles committee, now in its 13th year, is dedicated to making social life as a single person easy, lively and comfortable.

"Very often singles look at synagogues and think it's family-oriented. We want to make singles feel welcome at shul," said Linda Friedman, the committee's founder. When she became single, there was no programming offered through her synagogue for singles in the 45-plus age group – so she decided to change that.

"I wanted to serve the whole community," she said. Friedman believes that singles programming should not be limited to members of a particular synagogue.

Although the committee is based out of Shaar Shalom Synagogue, it caters to members and non-members alike. Having started with only four people, it has expanded to a committee of 16 people who organize events for hundreds of Toronto's Jewish singles.

"Over the years, we have more and more people come to the events," said Bryan Applebaum, one of the committee's co-chairs.

The group was initially created for the 45-plus crowd, but it now primarily serves people aged 55-plus. People who are divorced, widowed, or were never married are encouraged to come to events.

For each dance, concert, speaker, or holiday party, the committee invites about 700 Jewish singles. The group is currently preparing to host a concert on Aug. 12 featuring Italian tenor Andrea Garofalo.

The singles group's events are usually scheduled for every second month, and they are designed to foster a sense of community. "We're not a matchmaking society," said committee co-chair Sheldon Glass with a smile. Rather, he added, the events are about meeting new people and developing a richer social life.

Glass explained that as a newly single person with mostly married friends, "many times you get left out." Meeting other single people helps to broaden one's circle of friends.

"We really make an effort to create a warm, friendly atmosphere," Applebaum said.

Friedman added that a welcoming environment is especially important for people who are just starting to go out again after becoming single.

For her, as well as for the other committee members, the group has been integral in building a strong social life. Friedman now counts many of those she met through the singles group among her closest friends. "It builds a sense of chevra," she said.

Each of the 16 committee members takes an active role in planning the group's events. "I think part of our success with our own committee members [is that] we give them ownership of something," Glass said. The members do everything from booking entertainment to planning for refreshments, ticket sales and advertising.

"It really is a strong team effort," Friedman said. She, Applebaum and Glass insist that the group's success would be impossible without the work of the entire committee.

The Shaar Shalom singles committee is hoping to expand its reach to include as many of Toronto's Jewish adult singles as possible, and they encourage other singles groups to work with them to achieve that goal. "It's not a competitive thing, it's a cooperative thing," Friedman said.

For her and the rest of the committee members, bringing together the Jewish singles community is an important and rewarding task. "You don't do volunteer work unless you find it satisfying – it is very satisfying."

For more information on the Shaar Shalom singles committee's concert on Aug. 12, call Shaar Shalom Synagogue at 905-889-4975.

Mount Sinai comes full circle with new baby unit

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

In 1923, the Hebrew Maternity and Convalescent Hospital, later renamed Mount Sinai Hospital, opened its doors on Yorkville Avenue with 33 beds.

Coming full circle, the hospital, now a 472-bed academic health science centre on University Avenue, recently opened the new David and Stacey Cynamon Mother and Baby Unit, an expansion of the Frances Bloomberg Centre for Women's and Infants' Health. The expansion is part of the six newly built floors on the Murray Street side of the hospital.

Within two years, as part of the development project, the program will be expanded to include an enhanced neonatal intensive care unit, five new operating rooms, and labour and delivery rooms that are bigger and better equipped to deliver babies of high-risk mothers.

Joseph Mapa, president and CEO of Mount Sinai, said in a telephone interview that he "can't help but note the irony that the hospital began as a maternity hospital, and is now starting to rebuild with a women's health centre."

The design of the new unit includes decentralized care stations, which allow clinicians to be closer to their patients at all times; medicine cabinets in each room, which make it easier for nurses to tend to patients in a more timely manner; more private rooms, which help to reduce cross-contamination, and comfortable chairs for breastfeeding, which also double as recliners for overnight support partners.

"For Mount Sinai [this expansion] is monumental. [The hospital] is entering a historic new era," Mapa said.

"We are re-imaging the footprint of the entire hospital to further strengthen our commitment to delivering excellence in patient and family-centred care and clinical outcomes."

Rubinowicz, Valentine ז"ל

It is with great sadness that we announce the passing of our cherished Baba on July 1, 2012 (11 Tammuz 5772) at the age of 83. Peacefully and on her own terms, she left to join her beloved "Elec", Eliasz Rubinowicz ז"ל, our cherished Zaida.

Baba was a pillar of strength and a true Eshet Chayil. Her dedication and devotion to her family was exemplary. A proud mother, grandmother and great grandmother, and she let everyone know it. With her sparkling blue eyes and radiating warmth, Baba touched the lives of many and put smiles on the mouths of all that knew her. A profound loss for the Noon, Anbar and Ellis families. We have been blessed by her unwavering Strength, Courage, Compassion and Love. And this is how she will continue to be honored, remembered and treasured. Forever in our hearts.

Thank you to all our friends and family for your love and support during this difficult time.

Proper shoes help prevent injuries

Good posture starts at your feet. Inappropriate footwear is one of the most common causes of lower-body muscle, ligament and tendon injuries. Which shoes to choose is one of the most important decisions you can make before any activity.

Fitness Corner
Felyce Zomparelli

Price is not always a determinant of quality. Expensive shoes that squash your toes or compress your foot can lead to muscle strain and compensation resulting in bad posture and lower-back pain. Feet are designed with naturally occurring muscle adjustments to maintain balance. An over-padded shoe can result in loss of balance.

Choosing the right running shoes can affect the safety and efficiency of your workout. Selecting which shoes will provide the best support for you depends on the type of activity you are participating in, the arch height of the foot and wear patterns.

Long-distance runners need a shoe that allows more natural flexibility than people who weight-train, who require more foot stability.

The foot's arch ranges from flat to high. The best way to see your arch height is to make a bare footprint and inspect the shape left behind. If you can see a flat shape of your foot, the arch is flat. If the shape looks like it has been cut in half part way through, then the foot has a high arch.

Looking at the bottom of the shoes you use most for walking will show which parts of your foot hit the ground hardest when you step.

If you keep these factors in mind when you're choosing shoes, you will find shoes that support your feet, allowing proper support for your lower body. Since the lower body is responsible for power and balance in most activity, it is important to have a stable foundation.

Proper footwear during physical activity is also a key to avoiding injuries. Shoes that support your feet and ankles will provide proper alignment for your natural stance and decrease injuries from chronic improper use of muscles, joints and ligaments.

Jewish studies at Waterloo receives unexpected gift

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Jewish studies program at the University of Waterloo recently accepted a bequest from an unlikely source that will help fund an online Jewish studies course.

The late Bette Hagey, "a real stalwart of the United Church who died in 2009, left part of her estate to Waterloo's Jewish studies program, said Waterloo professor emeritus Paul Socken.

Socken, who founded the Jewish studies program and continues to serve as chair of the dean's advisory committee for the program, explained Hagey's connection to him and the program.

In 1993, Socken was approached by Brian Hendley, who was the university's dean of arts, with an offer to start a Jewish studies program at the university.

"The reason the dean came to me was... there was a rally at the [Trinity United] church against neo-Nazis who were coming to Kitchener to raise money... It's very possible [Hagey] was there or knew of it," Socken said.

He added that the dean had also seen Schindler's List, and that, coupled with the rally, inspired him to establish a Jewish studies program at Waterloo.

Paul Socken

Socken began his fundraising efforts, but didn't have enough funds to hire a professor for the program until 2002.

"When I had some money and started collecting interest, but didn't yet have enough for hiring, I started a public lecture series and that set the groundwork for people to expect things of a Jewish nature on campus," Socken said.

"Bette was always there in the audience along with my dear friend Ann [Dubé] and her husband, who were close friends with Bette. I met her subsequently in my friends' home and we were quite friendly," he said.

"When she passed away is when I found out that she had never married and she was an executive secretary at an insurance company. She had left her estate to her nieces and nephews, and... she left a portion of it to be divided equally between Trinity United and the Jewish studies program at Waterloo."

He said she left the program $50,000, enough to launch an online course in Jewish studies, which will be dedicated to her memory.

"This is extraordinary, given the relentless onslaught of the United Church against Israel," Socken said, but he added that he doubts her decision to leave this sum to the Jewish studies program was political.

"I don't think it was a strike against the church, I just think it was a gesture of generosity and thoughtfulness," he said.

"I think it's important that while there may be certain people in the upper levels of organizations... that are very strongly anti-Israel... there are individuals at the ground level who feel very differently toward Jews and Israel, and this is a concrete example of that."

Dubé, who said Hagey became a member of her extended family when they met in her "late middle age," agreed that Hagey's decision to leave the gift to the Jewish studies program was based on her admiration for Socken and interest in the Jewish roots of her Christian faith.

Dubé described Hagey as "a prickly, difficult, scary lady, who was, in her heart, incredibly generous," as well as a "deep thinker, an intellectual without formal education.

"She was a formidable lady. She was known at the Trinity United Church as the lady in the hat because she always wore smart and large hats. She was imposing and scary, but underneath, she had the heart of a marshmallow."

Dubé said she was aware of Hagey's intention to donate part of her estate to the Jewish studies program because when Hagey fell ill, Dubé took over her care and had her power of attorney.

"I think she had two motivations. One was her very strong admiration for Paul," Dubé said, adding that Socken and her late husband, Pierre, were the best of friends.

Dubé said Pierre was Jewish by birth, but chose to follow his wife and family into the United Church.

Still, "he was fascinated with his Jewish roots and taught a study course that involved a study of the Jewish religion and Genesis, and we often had Paul in to speak, because Paul, of course, is quite a scholar in Judaism," Dubé said.

"Bette got to know Paul that way and Bette was quite taken with him. Paul organized a series of lectures with the Jewish studies program and Bette attended them faithfully as long as her health permitted, and she very much enjoyed them."

She added that Hagey was also fascinated by the Jewish roots of her religious beliefs.

"I think that because she had studied the Jewish roots of her faith, she felt it was all going to the same cause."

Zerofootprint CEO develops utility bill app

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

Technion graduate Ron Dembo spoke to the Canadian Technion Society's Toronto chapter last week about a new piece of green technology.

Dembo, founder and CEO of Zerofootprint, has developed what he calls "the utility bill of the future."

The smartphone application allows users to see a minute-by-minute breakdown of their energy usage and compare it to others with similarly sized homes or offices.

The idea, says Dembo, is to make it easier for households and small businesses to understand energy efficiency and see how they can cut down on waste and expenditures.

Using a smartphone program called VELObill, a given household's water, gas, and electricity usage are illustrated using simple coloured charts.

Users are benchmarked against similar-sized homes to show if they are in the red, yellow or green zones for energy efficiency.

"Despite having the highest percentage of smart-meter saturation, most people in Ontario do not know how to interpret their own data," he said, adding that "in Canada, we're too rich, and energy is too cheap."

In response, Zerofootprint has "applied design thinking to the environmental space" using computer software technology.

In addition to helping individual households and small businesses reduce their energy bills, the application also opens an enormous dataset about consumer energy use.

By tracking millions of people's utility usage over a 24-hour period, the app can shed light on how and when people engage in energy-consuming activities like laundry, showering or watching television.

The application also targets larger institutions like banks and school buildings.

"We found that at some schools, there was over $1,000 wasted per student per year on energy," Dembo said.

In addition to founding the clean-technology company Zerofootprint, Dembo is also the founder and CEO of Algorithmics Incorporated, a risk-management software company.

Zerofootprint's Ron Dembo spoke to the Canadian Technion Society about "the utility bill of the future." [Riva Gold photo]

The Technion graduate's appearance was organized by the Canadian Technion Society (CTS), which is dedicated to raising awareness and funds for the Haifa-based public research university.

This year, CTS Toronto is focusing on Generation Next initiative to attract people ages 25 to 40 to the organization.

"We believe in what the Technion does for Israel, and for the world," says CTS national president Eddie Pal.

"Right now, we want to get as many young professionals involved as we can."

As part of their "evolutionary revitalization stage," CTS will host a lecture by the Technion's Ishi Talmon, who will speak about nanotechnology. They will also lead an October event at the Hockey Hall of Fame showcasing new Technion technology designed to enhance cognitive training for basketball and hockey players.

Israel Business Briefs

Intel expanding Israeli operations

Intel Capital said last week that it is expanding operations in Israel, as it seeks to boost its portfolio of Israeli technology companies and improve returns on its investments. Marcos Battisti, managing director of Intel Capital for Western Europe and Israel, said a lack of local staff has held back investments until now, but the office has added two venture capital veterans. Battisti said the company will be more aggressive, since it realized that "we have missed opportunities here." Intel's global investment arm has invested in more than 60 companies in Israel since 1996. It has had a number of successful exits including Anobit, which was acquired by Apple; Passave, acquired by PMC-Sierra; and Gteko, bought by Microsoft, while Mellanox went public on Nasdaq.

Newspaper circulation up in first half

While revenues may be shrinking for Israeli newspapers, the key parameter of popularity is looking up: circulation increased in the first half of 2012, according to a survey conducted by TGI. The proportion of Israelis getting printed papers on weekdays rose to 66.5 per cent from 63.2 per cent in the second half of 2011. For weekend papers distributed on Friday, the figures were almost unchanged at 66.7 per cent this year.

Yisrael Hayom still has the largest circulation on weekdays with a 38.7 per cent share in the first half of the year, compared to Yedioth's 37.6 per cent, but Yedioth has almost closed the gap as Yisrael Hayom has also lost ground. Ma'ariv has managed to stop its previous trend and rise to an 11.9 per cent share, and Ha'aretz was stable at seven per cent. But Yedioth still has the highest circulation on weekends with a 43.4 per cent share compared with Yisrael Hayom's 31.3 per cent. Ma'ariv and Ha'aretz have 14.1 per cent and 7.6 per cent respectively on weekends.

Teva's ProAir inhaler under attack

Teva Pharmaceutical Industries' ProAir inhaler is under threat from a generic competitor. A relatively unknown generic firm has applied to the U.S. Food and Drug Administration for approval of its generic version of the quick relief rescue inhaler for asthma and chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD).

The request was filed under a section of the Drug Price Competition and Patent Term Restoration Act, informally known as the Hatch-Waxman Act, which appeals the validity of Teva's patent on the ProAir inhaler. ProAir is protected by five patents. The earliest expires in February 2014 and the last in September 2028. ProAir competes with GlaxoSmithKline's Ventolin. ProAir sales totalled $90 million US in the first quarter of 2012, an 11 per cent drop compared to the same quarter of 2011, due to a relatively mild winter that reduced the number of flu cases.

Italy holds Munich memorial

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — The Italian delegation to the 2012 London Olympiad made an emotional gesture at the Olympic village on Sunday by holding a minute of silence together with a number of Israeli representatives for the 11 victims of the 1972 Munich Massacre.

More than 30 members of the Italian delegation – headed by Sports Minister Piero Gnudi, Italian Olympic Committee president Giovanni Petrucci and International Olympic Committee member Franco Carraro – held the ceremony near the Israelis' quarters.

Piero Gnudi

Israel was represented by Zvi Varshaviak, chairman of the Olympic Committee of Israel; Efraim Zinger, head of the Olympic delegation; shooter Sergey Richter on behalf of the athletes, and Guy Strik on behalf of the coaches.

Varshaviak said the gesture was beautiful and moving. "It's a brave sign of solidarity and friendship between the Olympic family of Italy and that of Israel, which has continued for many years," he said.

The International Olympic Committee (IOC) has refused repeated Israeli requests to honour the slain Israeli Olympians at the opening ceremonies of both the London Games and those of previous Olympiads.

Zinger thanked the Italians and explained to them that his committee is doing everything to memorialize the 11 Munich victims as Israelis. However, he said, it is important to remember that they were also Olympic athletes, coaches and judges who were murdered during the Olympics.

"Therefore they are children of the Olympic movement and in our opinion it is the moral obligation of the International Olympic Committee to find a suitable way to perpetuate their memory," Zinger added.

In related news, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs commended CTV's Olympic hosts for taking their "principled stand" on air as the Israeli delegation entered the Olympic stadium in London during last Friday's opening ceremonies.

As the Israeli team prepared to enter the stadium, veteran Olympics host Brian Williams noted that his "position is well known and it is one that I have taken in previous Olympics. It is wrong that the IOC refuses to have a minute's silence for the Israeli athletes that were slaughtered in Munich. It is a much bigger issue this year, as it's the 40th anniversary of Munich."

He continued "Members of the Canadian government, yesterday our governor general, all [have called] for a moment's silence. [IOC president Jacques] Rogge says the ceremony is not the place to remember a tragic event, but... it's one of the most significant and world-changing events in Olympic history. It absolutely should have been done here. The IOC worries about politics? This event is political by its very nature."

CTV News anchor Lisa LaFlamme then added, "The widow of one of the victims spoke out saying 'they came with dreams, they went home in coffins.' They want to be remembered here tonight," to which Williams replied, "And remember – they died as Olympians."

On NBC, sportscaster Bob Costas also remembered the 11 Israelis killed in 1972 on air as the Israeli delegation entered the stadium.

"These games mark the 40th anniversary of the 1972 tragedy in Munich, when 11 Israeli coaches and athletes were murdered by Palestinian terrorists," Costas said during NBC's broadcast of the opening ceremonies. "There have been calls from a number of quarters for the IOC to acknowledge that with a moment of silence at some point in tonight's ceremony. The IOC denied that request, noting it had honored the victims on other occasions."

Costas noted that Rogge held a moment of silence in the Olympic Village earlier in the week.

"Still," Costas said, "for many, tonight, with the world watching, is the true time and place to remember those who were lost, and how and why they died."

After 12 seconds of on-air silence, Costas cut to a commercial.

Israeli Sports and Culture Minister Limor Livnat stood up in the VIP stands during Rogge's address at the opening ceremonies. The protest came after Israel's Foreign Ministry reportedly attempted to convince representatives from other countries to join her.

The official Olympics TV feed did not show Livnat standing during the speech, but it was shown on Israeli television after the ceremony ended, the Times of Israel reported.

Israel television stopped its commentary for 30 seconds as the Israeli athletes marched into the stadium while displaying photos of the 11 Munich victims.

PA objects to minute of silence request

JTA

TEL AVIV — The head of the Palestinian Olympic Committee called the campaign to hold a minute of silence for the 11 Israelis murdered at the 1972 Munich Olympics "racism."

In a letter to International Olympic Committee head Jacques Rogge, Jibril Rajoub wrote that "sports are a bridge for love, communication and the spreading of peace between nations and should not be used for divisiveness and the spread of racism," according to the Times of Israel.

Rogge declined numerous requests to hold the minute of silence at the opening ceremony of the London Games held on Friday. He held a minute of silence in memory of the athletes at a small ceremony in the Olympic Village on July 23.

Black September, a Palestinian terrorist group, was responsible for the killings in Munich.

In an interview with the French news agency AFP on July 23, Rajoub said that "sport in Palestine is a means to achieve national goals" as well as "a tool of struggle to present the Palestinian cause."

The call to hold a minute of silence in memory of the murdered athletes has received the endorsement of numerous public figures, including U.S. President Barack Obama and presumed Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney.

All eyes are on Israeli trial of methanol

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c.com

HAIFA — With gas prices soaring along with the demand for energy independence, energy experts in the United States eagerly await the results of an Israeli pilot project testing the fuel M15.

M15 is made of 15 per cent methanol and 85 per cent gasoline. Methanol is made from natural gas, which both countries have in abundance.

M15 is produced by Dor Chemicals of Haifa, which is running the six-month trial along with gas-station chain Ten Petroleum, with the support and supervision of Israel's ministries of energy and water resources, transportation and environmental protection.

"We would like to prove that no changes are necessary to cars or to gas station equipment in order to use this blend," Ten CEO Danny Ben-Ner said. M15 is already popular in China, but test results on its possible effects to car engines and gas pumps have not been made public.

"We are closely monitoring the project because this is the most important experiment that is currently taking place in the world outside of China," says Gal Luft of the Institute for Analysis of Global Security, a Washington, D.C., think-tank.

Expectations are that the pilot will show no modifications are necessary and no harm is done to the engines or pumps.

"The standards will allow us to use the information to demonstrate to the U.S. government and auto industry that existing vehicles can run on blends of methanol," says Luft.

Ben-Ner explains that 11 cars are participating in the test — 10 of them are from Dor's corporate fleet and the other one belongs to a Ten station manager.

"They were all checked before the start of the pilot in early June and will be double-tested again after they drive 30,000 kilometres," says Ben-Ner. "All the components from the fuel station, including pumps, will also be tested."

"We have identified the potential of natural gas-based oil to replace gasoline and diesel fuel in transportation, and methanol is one of the best candidates for short- and medium-term implementation," says Brachah Halaf, senior manager of oil replacement for the Ministry of Energy and Water Resources.

"When we got a request to finance and oversee this pilot project from Dor, we embraced it. We were looking for experiments that are system-oriented and need to be co-ordinated in many aspects among several ministries."

Emissions from natural gas-based fuel are much less toxic than those of regular gasoline, and methanol is biodegradable.

It's also cheaper. Using M15 would reduce gas prices in Israel by 50 agorot per litre (roughly equivalent to 13 cents per litre).

"The question is how to best use natural gas to replace oil," says Luft.

"It's a question being asked in Israel and also in the United States, which has abundant natural gas and a dependency on oil. Natural gas is one-sixth the price of oil on an energy-equivalent basis, so it makes total sense to replace oil with natural gas in transportation. Our view is that turning gas into methanol is the easiest and most economical way to do it."

Rich stores of natural gas have been discovered in Israel and in the United States over the past couple of years, and the race is on to plan how to use it in the most efficient way for fuel.

Iranian leaders 'are testing our moral defences'

He went on to mention the U.S.-Israeli relationship, saying, "We serve the same cause and we have the same enemies. The security of Israel is a national security interest of the United States."

"An enduring alliance is more than strategic – it's a force for good in the world," he said, adding that the United States and Israel are part of the same "fellowship of democracies," and that the two countries "speak the same language" of freedom and justice.

Romney was met with strong applause when he mentioned the Munich Massacre of 1972, in which 11 Israeli Olympic athletes and coaches were slain. "Tragedies like this are not reserved to the past," he said, adding that they are a constant reminder of hate and the will behind "acts of hate."

His comments came amid controversy over the International Olympic Committee's refusal to commemorate the massacre with a moment of silence during the London 2012 opening ceremonies.

After his meeting with Netanyahu earlier in the day, in which the two stressed the dangers of a nuclear Iran, Romney described the Islamic Republic in his speech as "the most destabilizing nation in the world," and added that Tehran supports terrorists and the Assad regime in Syria.

He said Iranian leaders speak of wiping Israel off the map and that anyone who does not believe their rhetoric is naive or worse.

"The ayatollahs in Iran are testing our moral defences," Romney told the crowd in Jerusalem, adding that the conduct of Iran's leaders "gives us no reason to trust them with nuclear material.

"We should employ any and all measures" to prevent Iran from following a nuclear course, he said. "We recognize Israel's right to defend itself and America's right to stand with you."

The Republican hopeful also stressed that it was the responsibility of the international community to ensure that Egypt upholds its peace agreement with Israel.

Iran behind Delhi attack, Indian police say

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW DELHI — The Iranian Revolutionary Guard was behind terrorist attack last February on the Israeli Embassy in New Delhi, an Indian police investigation has found.

Tali Yehoshua-Koren, wife of the Defence Ministry's representative to India, was injured in the incident.

The Times of India newspaper, which published the findings of the investigation, reported that members of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard began speaking with Indian journalist Syed Mohammad Ahmad Kazmi about the possibility of carrying out a strike against Israeli diplomats in New Delhi as early as February 2011, more than a year before the attack. At the time, a number of Iranian nuclear scientists had been assassinated, and Tehran blamed Israel for the deaths.

The investigation found that Kazmi, who is so far the only person who has been arrested on suspicion of involvement in the February attack, had been in contact with the Iranian regime for at least 10 years.

Indian security forces have tried in recent months to get information from the Iranians about a number of Iranian citizens that are suspected of being involved. Indian police have sent detailed letters to Iran asking for help in the investigation, although to date Iran has not co-operated.

The Indians gave the Iranians a list of five people that are suspected of belonging to the Revolutionary Guard. According to the Times report, the main suspect in the attack is Houshang Afshar Irani. Irani says he's a professional builder, although he acted as the motorcyclist who attached the bomb to the car of the Israeli embassy representative in the attack.

Another suspect is Sedaghatzadeh Masoud, who commanded the cell that carried out the attack. Indian police identified Masoud as a salesperson in a Tehran-based company. According to suspicions, he was a planner of a wave of attacks in New Delhi, Bangkok and Tbilisi.

Indian police identified a number of other suspects involved in the attack, Syed Ali Mahdiansadr, the owner of a Tehran cellphone shop, Mohammad Reza Abolghasemi, a Tehran government clerk, and Ali Akbar Norouzishayan, a retired accountant from the Iranian capital.

Another suspect is Leila Rohani, who is also suspected of being involved in the attack in New Delhi, as well as Bangkok, and has managed an escape to Iran to avoid arrest.

Pan-European Jewish identity remains elusive

Ruth Ellen Gruber
JTA

BUDAPEST — Is there such a thing as a European Jewish identity? Can such an identity be created? What clout can European Jewry wield in global Jewish affairs?

Jewish policymakers have debated these questions ever since the fall of communism in the early 1990s erased east-west borders and opened the way to a new Jewish chapter in Europe. Back then, some strategists saw fostering a European Jewish identity as key to the political goal of making European Jewry a "third pillar" – or equal player – alongside Jews in Israel and North America.

Today, it is clear that the optimistic ideal of a pan-European Jewish identity remains elusive and the political goal of European Jewry as a strong third pillar has yet to materialize. Yet rejuvenated efforts are under way to tackle the challenge.

But what happened to damper the initial enthusiasm for the idea?

For one thing, "French Jews are very French, U.K. Jews are very British. It's a simple fact," said Rabbi Andrew Baker, director of international Jewish affairs for the American Jewish Committee (AJC). "Eastern European communities had many challenges during these last two decades in re-establishing Jewish life. But in the process, we have also seen how they were pulled closer to their respective governments' policies and views."

Or, as put by Barry Kosmin, who recently directed a survey of European Jewish leaders for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's International Center for Community Development, "We have aspirations versus reality."

The survey polled 328 "Jewish leaders and opinion formers" in 32 countries, and as far as Europe was concerned, it demonstrated a dramatic gap between theory and practice.

Most respondents "strongly supported" Jewish solidarity and a European Jewish identity, but only 22 per cent had "direct knowledge" of other Jewish communities in Europe and only 15 per cent said they were familiar with "the goals and programs" of the main European Jewish organizations.

Finally, more than 70 per cent agreed that "European Jewry is not composed of integrated communities across the continent."

Kosmin presented the survey finding in June at a conference in Barcelona sponsored by the JDC and the European Council of Jewish Communities (ECJC), an umbrella organization that recently revived operations in an attempt to kick-start closer European co-operation.

The data, said ECJC president Evan Lazar, prove the need for his group.

"The fact that the survey shows that so few community leaders know what is happening with other European Jewish communities validates the purpose and reason for being of the ECJC," Lazar, a Prague-based lawyer, told JTA.

The survey findings, in fact, reflect how both prospects and conditions have changed since the heady post-Communist days of the 1990s.

"There was a lot of optimism at the time, and looking back now, it is clear that it was not justified," Rabbi Baker said. "But understanding why is more difficult."

Rabbi Baker, who helped organize a number of conferences and other initiatives promoting European Jewish identity and integration, said the lack of success was due to a combination of factors. Changed realities in the global arena, of course, played a major role: among them the collapse of the Middle East peace process, the second intifadah, the rise of Islamic extremism and spikes in anti-semitism largely linked to growing Arab and Muslim communities in Europe.

"Most European Jewish communities today face significant security concerns that no one imagined at the time of our conferences in the 1990s," he said.

The official report on a 1995 meeting in Prague – the first major conference on pan-European Jewish identity issues – declared in fact that it had taken place at a time "when Israel is not under threat and the problems of anti-semitism no longer pose an immediate danger."

But, Rabbi Baker said internal Jewish failures also helped thwart expectations. For one thing, the AJC official said, strategists had not realized how "nationally connected" European Jewish communities were and still are.

Ironically, he added, "Today, it is the need to confront common concerns and threats – antisemitism and anti-Israel campaigns primarily – that serves as the basis for pan-European and pan-Diaspora co-operation."

Against this background, Jewish strategists and policymakers are attempting to chart new courses.

"We are living in a time of multiple and shifting identities," said Mario Izcovich, director of pan-European programs at the JDC. "It is not a fixed picture. People don't seem to want to belong to anything permanently."

Still, he told JTA, the concept of European Jewry as the third pillar of world Jewry remains a viable political model to aim for.

"It simply cannot be that political issues regarding Jews can be discussed just by Israel and the U.S.," Izcovich said.

Hampering efforts, say some strategists and researchers, is a growing disconnect in some countries between mainstream Jewish institutions and the way Jewish lives are lived. Informal networks and alternative initiatives, they said, are increasingly important, particularly for younger Jews.

"Real identity comes in an informal way," said Mircea Cernov, who heads Haver, a Budapest-based NGO that teaches schoolchildren about Judaism and the Jewish People. "Real connections based on Jewish identity come outside Jewish institutions, just as real Jewish life is not according to the formalization of Jewish organizations and institutions."

Sociologist Andras Kovacs, who has charted the development of Jewish life in Hungary for decades and co-ordinated a survey released in 2011 on Jewish identity in five post-Communist European countries, agreed.

In many places, he told JTA, "new initiatives come from civic groups, not from the established Jewish community."

Moreover, Kovacs adds, "What people say about their identity is different from European Jewish politics and Jewish institutional politics. Regarding Jewish identity, the data show that a sense of European-ness does exist. But it is not so present in the Jewish leadership."

That leaves Europe's Jewish leaders – just like many in America – trying to connect their goals to the realities of the people they seek to unite.

Israel Briefs

Vet sets himself alight

A disabled Israeli veteran set himself alight two days after the death of an Israeli protester who set himself on fire during a social justice protest. The 45-year-old veteran, who used a wheelchair, poured gasoline on himself at a bus station in Yehud in central Israel. Onlookers doused the flames. He was taken to a hospital in Tel Aviv with burns on 80 per cent of his body, according to reports. His self-immolation occurred hours before the scheduled funeral of Moshe Silman, who set himself alight a week ago, during a social justice protest and died on July 20. Protest leaders, Silman's family and organizations that help the poor have come out publicly against imitating Silman's desperate act, but at least six people have threatened to set themselves on fire in recent days. The disabled veteran reportedly was in severe financial hardship.

Pre-emptive strike less costly

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said that a pre-emptive military strike on Iran's nuclear facilities would be less costly for Israel than Iran's possession of a nuclear weapon. In an address to the Israeli army's National Security College, Barak said the prospect of a nuclear-armed Iran "would be many times more complex, dangerous and costly, both in terms of human life and in terms of resources, than a pre-emptive strike." The statement came as the U.S. Congress is readying to approve a package of sanctions on Iran that are aimed at further mitigating Iranian oil revenues. The sanctions would cut down on electronic fund transfers from Iranian banks and also reduce transactions with Iranian national oil and tanker companies.

Jews in West Bank

More than 350,000 Jews are living in the West Bank, a 4.5 per cent increase over last year, according to the Israeli government. Peace Now, which monitors settlement growth, claimed that the number is inflated. According to the Times of Israel, Israel's Interior Ministry reported that 350,150 Israelis live in the West Bank, an increase of 15,580 from last year. Including eastern Jerusalem and other Jerusalem neighbourhoods, the total population of Jews living beyond the Green Line that separates Israel proper from its administered territories is about 650,000.

Hezbollah not terrorist: EU

Israeli media reported that European Union (EU) President Erato Kozakou-Marcoullis said that the EU would not grant Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman's request to declare Iran-funded Hezbollah as a terrorist organization because "Hezbollah is a political party in Lebanon which also runs charity organizations." Lieberman's request came after reports that Hezbollah organized the July 18 bombing of a bus carrying Israeli tourists in Bulgaria. "It's time to add Hezbollah to the list of terrorist organizations in Europe, as a message from the international community to those who on the one hand meet with diplomats and on the other hand murder innocent civilians on the same continent," Lieberman said at a conference of foreign ministers in Brussels.

A primer on modern Egyptian history

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Hosni Mubarak's downfall was long in coming.

Mohammed Morsi has compiled a list of historic firsts since his election as Egypt's new president this past June.

A member of the heretofore banned Muslim Brotherhood, he is Egypt's first civilian president, as well as the first Islamist elected to lead an Arab state.

By any measure, Morsi, an American-educated engineer, had to struggle to come so far. The clique of generals who have effectively ruled Egypt since the fall of its former president, Hosni Mubarak, manoeuvred to block his path to the presidency.

In the coming months, with a new constitution yet to be written and the Islamist-led parliament dissolved by the Supreme Military Council, he and the generals will jockey for power.

As Steven A. Cook suggests in The Struggle for Egypt: From Nasser to Tahrir Square (Oxford University Press), a fine primer on the Arab world's most populous and influential nation, modern Egypt is inured to political turbulence.

From an Egyptian officers' revolt in 1882 against the monarchy to the Arab Spring uprising in 2011, which resulted in Mubarak's ouster, Egypt has lurched from one crisis to the next since the late 19th century. This is the period that Cook, an American expert on Arab politics, examines in his deeply researched and felicitously written study.

He begins, appropriately enough, in 1882, when an Egyptian army colonel, Ahmed al Urabi, staged a rebellion to protest the erosion of Egypt's sovereignty. Having incurred crushing debts to France and Britain, Egypt fell under their control. In response to Urabi's challenge, Britain invaded Egypt, defeating Urabi's forces in the Nile Delta and turning Egypt into a colonial protectorate.

In his sweeping survey, Cook examines the British imperial presence in Egypt and Egypt's attempts to wriggle free of Britain's domination.

He notes that the most important group to emerge in Egypt during the interwar years from 1918 to 1939 was a religious society known as the Muslim Brotherhood. Founded in 1928, it was led by a primary school teacher named Hassan al Banna. The Muslim Botherhood, he adds, would have "a profound and lasting" impact on Egypt, since it tapped into Egyptian resentments and frustrations.

The Free Officers movement, which supplanted the corrupt monarchy 60 years ago last month, was spearheaded by General Mohammed Naguib. He was summarily shoved aside by Gamal Abdel Nasser, an ambitious colonel who had fought courageously in the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

Nasser and his crafty cronies imposed martial law on their countrymen, essentially developing the authoritarian political order that has defined Egypt for decades, and turned Egypt into a hegemonic Arab power.

In one bold stroke, Nasser endeared himself to Arab elites and masses by nationalizing the Suez Canal, a marvel of French engineering. Britain bought its controlling shares in 1875 thanks to Rothschild funds.

The nationalization of the canal triggered British and French military intervention in the 1956 Suez war. Israel participated in that war, confirming Egyptian suspicions that Zionism was an extension of Europe's effort to colonize the Middle East.

As Cook points out, Israel and Egypt were already locked in a state of war when the Israeli army stormed into the Sinai Peninsula. During the mid-1950s, tensions boiled over as Israel accused the Egyptian government of supporting cross-border raids launched from the Gaza Strip.

At home, Nasser portrayed himself as an ally of the impoverished masses, instituting land reform that sorely alienated landlords. But Nasser's reputation as a reformer was tarnished by the anemic performance of Egypt's economy, writes Cook. "Egypt remained a place of vast asymmetries in wealth, health and education."

Nasser's vice-president and successor, Anwar Sadat, was widely considered a lightweight. But in reality, Sadat – a pro-Nazi sympathizer in World War II – was a shrewd operator who outwitted his rivals after Nasser's sudden death in 1970.

Cook documents Sadat's quasi rapprochement with the Muslim Brotherhood and his decisions to expel Soviet military advisors, launch the Yom Kippur War and make peace with Israel.

Cook also delves into Sadat's policy of improving relations with the United States in the post-war period. As he puts it, "Although Sadat relied on Soviet goodwill in order to fight the [1973] war, he harboured the belief... that the United States was the critical link to regional peace and prosperity."

Sadat's successor, Mubarak, also hewed to a pro-U.S. stance, believing that only the United States had the resources to assist Egypt in its development.

Egypt enjoyed unprecedented economic growth in the first decade of the 21st century, but the ills of crony capitalism ate away at Mubarak's popularity. His failure to address problems related to crumbling infrastructure, substandard health-care service and an inadequate educational system were contributory causes of his demise.

Egypt was theoretically a democracy, but in practice, Egypt was nothing more than a police state where the status quo was maintained and real dissent was quashed.

To the majority of Egyptians, Mubarak was the symbol of a hopelessly corrupt system, and had to go.

According to Cook, Mubarak's downfall, in only 18 tumultuous days, was long in coming. Pent-up grievances in Egyptian society were compounded by the murders of pro-democracy activists, the continuing rise in food prices and the revelations of "rapacious thievery" on the part of immensely wealthy business figures directly connected to Mubarak.

The Mubarak regime preserved Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel, but it was a decidedly cold peace. Across the political spectrum, from the Nasserists and the Muslim Brotherhood to the Tagammu and the Wafd parties, Egypt's political elite opposed normalization of relations with Israel, Cook observes.

He elaborates: "For many Egyptians, including intellectuals, government officials and ordinary people, Zionism was – and remains – widely regarded as a version of western colonialism and thus a direct threat to Egypt."

With Morsi's inauguration as president, a new chapter in Egyptian history has begun. Cook, whose book was published several months before the Morsi era was ushered in, says it will be "extraordinarily difficult" to predict Egypt's future. But "the struggle for Egypt continues," he writes.

Cook's book should be read in conjunction with Robert L. Tignor's magisterial Egypt: A Short History (Princeton University Press). Tignor, a professor emeritus at Princeton, takes a reader on a fascinating journey from ancient to contemporary Egypt.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Scholar/poet Panofsky delves into print culture

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

For Canadian academic Ruth Panofsky, who has published widely in the field of print culture and book history, the MacMillan Company of Canada seemed like an irresistible topic.

"Along with Ryerson Press and McClelland and Stewart, MacMillan was instrumental in shaping Canada's literary culture of the last century," said Panofsky, a professor in the department of English and the joint graduate program in communication and culture at Ryerson University in Toronto. "But Macmillan also encouraged countless Canadian authors and helped establish a publishing industry for Canada."

Thanks to her previous research on Canadian novelists Mazo de la Roche and Adele Wiseman, both of whom were MacMillan authors, she came to realize that the men and women who managed the company through its history were as interesting and dynamic as the authors themselves.

And so Panofsky, an expert on Wiseman, decided to write The Literary Legacy of the Macmillan Company of Canada: Making Books and Mapping Culture, which was published recently.

Panofsky's interest in print culture and book history developed in graduate school at York University, where she specialized in Canadian literature and wrote her doctoral dissertation on Thomas Chandler Haliburton (1796-1865), Canada's first internationally recognized author.

Panofsky's thesis was on Haliburton's The Clockmaker, a series of sketches that established him as an international celebrity. "Remarkably, in its day, The Clockmaker was as popular as the work of Charles Dickens. But today its overt racism and misogynism makes it difficult to read," she said.

Nonetheless, Panofsky was intrigued by its historical success, and her work on Haliburton drew her to archival research and publishing history, which, she noted, "invariably uncovers the fascinating, behind-the-scenes details of author-publisher relations."

Born and raised in Montreal, she has been drawn to books since childhood.

"I was an avid reader as a child. My interest in books was encouraged by an uncle who was himself a voracious reader. He brought me all kinds of books. As a pre-teen, I devoured the Nancy Drew series, the All-of-a-Kind Family series, the biographies of Helen Kelller and Vincent Van Gogh and so on."

She added, "High school introduced me to Canadian writers. I discovered the poetry of A.M. Klein and the novels of Mordecai Richler and Margaret Atwood. I remember spending hours in my high school library immersed in a good book."

Canadian literature helped her understand her place in the world.

As she put it, "I am drawn to writing that probes the nuances of Canadian experience and sensibility in a diverse, complex, ever-changing universe. My taste for Canadian writing has only deepened and expanded over the years and includes all genres from short fiction and essays to poetry, which I did not read as a young person."

Panofsky, a member of the editorial board of Canadian Jewish Studies and the editor of Parchment: Contemporary Canadian-Jewish Writing, is particularly intrigued by Wiseman (1928-1992), the author of the novels The Sacrifice and Crackpot, a winner of the Governor General's Award and a woman of her mother's generation.

Panofsky has charted Wiseman's contribution to Canadian literature in scholarly books ranging from Adele Wiseman: An Annotated Bibliography to The Force of Vocation: The Literary Career of Adele Wiseman.

She believes that Wiseman's creative probing of profound moral issues, plus her devotion to the literary life, are her most significant achievements. In her view, Wiseman's works warrant "closer critical scrutiny."

By no coincidence, one of Panofsky's areas of interest turns on Canadian Jewish female authors, which she covers in At Odds in the World: Essays on Jewish Canadian Women Writers.

"Jewish Canadian male writers like Richler, Leonard Cohen, Norman Levine, Irving Layton and Matt Cohen have long received critical attention, but their female counterparts have never had the same public profile," she observed.

Panofsky has a high regard for Helen Weinzweig, who produced avant-garde prose that was both challenging and disturbing, and Miriam Waddington, who used lyric verse to probe the female experience.

Among contemporary Jewish Canadian women writers, Panofsky admires the novelists Anne Michaels, Lilian Nattel and Nancy Richler and the poets Ronna Bloom, Susan Glickman, Isa Millman, Merle Nudelman, Karen Shenfeld and Rhea Tregebov.

A poet herself, Panofsky has published two books of poetry, one of which, Laike and Nahum: A Poem in Two Voices, won the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Award for Poetry in 2008.

Published in 2007, Laike and Nahum was inspired by her Russian grandparents of the same names.

"Laike settled in Montreal as a young child with her parents. Nahum was brought to Montreal by one of his brothers. He was a presser and she was a homemaker. I knew them very well and lived with them for one summer as an undergraduate student. I was deeply attached to my loving grandmother and still miss her."

Panofsky's father, Marvin, was a clothing importer, and her mother, Brenda Yampolosky, was a housewife.

"I grew up in Chomedey, a suburb of Montreal," said Panofsky, 53. "In 1976, I joined the mass exodus of Anglophones from Quebec and left Montreal to attend Carleton University in Ottawa. I've remained in Ontario ever since, but I miss Montreal, which I visit regularly and regard as my psychological home."

Panofsky – whose husband Gary Gottlieb is a family lawyer – graduated from Carleton in 1980 and completed an master's degree at York University two years later. Her research paper was on Miriam Waddington's early poetry.

The mother of two children, Bram and Liza, she derives enormous satisfaction from being an academic.

"For as long as I can remember, I wanted to be an English professor," said Panofsky, whom one of her students described as highly intelligent, warm and creative. "I am one of those lucky people who early in life felt drawn to a profession, and happily, I have realized my ambition.

"I am comfortable surrounded by books and deeply gratified to be able to share my love of literature with my students at Ryerson. I have no plans for retirement, which seems far off, and I'm determined to keep writing and reading for a long time."

Independent filmmaker values art over profit

Michelle Bitran
Intern

If Lloyd Kaufman's parents didn't make him learn French as a child, he may never have become the artistic filmmaker that he is today.

The 40-year veteran of independent filmmaking, responsible for cult classics such as The Toxic Avenger, said his first brush with creative film was in the pages of influential French film magazine Cahiers du Cinéma.

Kaufman, 66, discovered the magazine as a Chinese studies student at Yale University in Connecticut. He began reading it regularly as the enthusiasm of his cinephile roommates rubbed off on him. Kaufman describes his university-aged run-in with film as kismet, or destiny.

"If I didn't speak French, I probably would've become the Michael Bay of American filmmaking," he said, referencing the action film director who is known for churning out high-budget movies rife with special effects.

Kaufman, who will be in Toronto for the annual Fan Expo convention in August, was once en route to becoming a social worker or a teacher before finding his calling in film. "It was the '60s, and I thought I would make the world a better place," he said with a laugh on the phone from his Long Island, N.Y., office.

Instead, Kaufman founded an independent production company, Troma Entertainment, which he runs in partnership with Michael Herz, arguably making the world of film a better place.

Troma, straying far from the Hollywood world of glitz, glamour and multi-million-dollar budgets, works on very low budgets and focuses on unique, often shocking films that offer "genuine emotion" and social commentary.

"Troma is the jalapeño peppers on the cultural pizza, so to speak," Kaufman said, explaining that while high-budget films appeal to a wide audience, Troma films typically appeal to a niche audience, but are more challenging and interesting for viewers. "I don't think Batman gives you a genuine emotion – it gives you $200 million of something," he said.

Founded in 1974, Troma, unlike many independent film companies that have fizzled out due to financial pressure, has been operating continuously in New York for the last 38 years.

Early in his career, Kaufman took on an Israeli project with director Ami Artzi. The resulting film, called Big Gus, What's the Fuss? in English and HaBalash HaAmitz Shvartz in Hebrew, was, according to Kaufman, a huge flop, both financially and artistically. "We managed to make the worst movie ever made," he said with typical frankness.

Although Big Gus never took off in North America or in Israel, years later, Kaufman would learn he still has an Israeli following. While travelling through Israel, one of his daughters found a Toxic Avenger yarmulke, which she brought back for him.

To this day, the 1984 low-budget horror comedy about a "weakling" who falls into a vat of toxic waste and becomes a huge, super-strong creature is likely Kaufman's most widely known film. It spawned a series of sequels as well as a children's TV cartoon called Toxic Crusaders.

While many people may be unfamiliar with Troma's original works, they probably have heard of the many well-known actors and industry professionals that Kaufman's company helped launch. Among them are Samuel L. Jackson, Matt Stone and Trey Parker of South Park fame, and filmmaker James Gunn.

Troma's independence, Kaufman explained, allows it much more artistic freedom in a world where "there are a small number of giant media conglomerates, and most of the media that we get comes from those conglomerates or their vassals."

Kaufman believes that with the rise of the Internet and file sharing, as well as the ease with which simple film equipment can be acquired, the monopoly of media conglomerates will be challenged. "The making of cinema has been democratized," he said. "You can be a teacher, or a nurse or a social worker and still make movies."

Troma recently posted many of its films to YouTube so that fans can access them free, and Kaufman has also allowed for a Toxic Avenger musical to be made without charging for rights to the material.

For Kaufman, giving people access to the art, emotion and social commentary of Troma's films is more important than the profit. "I do believe that if you share your art with your fans, your fans will take care of you."

Kaufman will be at the Fan Expo convention which runs at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre from Aug. 23-26. www.fanexpocanada.com

EYE ON ARTS

By BILL GLADSTONE

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART TWO: A RUSSIAN JEW IN BLOOMSBURY

Samuel Koteliansky was never a major figure in the Bloomsbury circle. Author Leon Edel never even mentions him in Bloomsbury: A House of Lions, his masterful portrait of the loose affiliation of writers and artists associated with the London-based literary circle, nor is he mentioned in the other books about Bloomsbury on my shelf.

We owe it to writer Galya Diment, author of the 2011 book A Russian Jew of Bloomsbury: The Life and Times of Samuel Koteliansky (McGill-Queen's University Press), for shining a welcome spotlight on this intriguing and worthy subject, who was an important influence on D. H. Lawrence and a friend of Katherine Mansfield, H. G. Wells, Mark Gertler and other prominent figures of his day.

Kot – he acquired that nickname because few of his British friends could spell or pronounce his full surname – was born in Ostropol (now in Ukraine) in 1880 and arrived in London in 1911, having already devoured all of the original works of Tolstoy, Chekhov, Dostoyevsky and other Russian writers in their originals. The Diaghilev Ballet was then at the height of its popularity in London and the British public was entering into a mania for all things Russian, just as it had done for all things Japanese in an earlier era.

Introduced into the fringes of the Bloomsbury group, Kot's deep understanding of Russian literature and his passionate approach to life and art made him – despite his Jewishness – someone worth knowing. D. H. Lawrence invited him along with some other friends on a walking tour of the Lake District in July 1914. Kot was thereafter close with Lawrence for the rest of his life and exchanged more letters with him than anyone else outside of Lawrence's own family.

Kot's friendship with Lawrence thrived, Dimant writes, despite Lawrence's frequent antisemitic remarks. Apparently few people in that era regarded expressions of racial hostility as politically incorrect: there was no need for people to curb their tongues or keep their discriminatory thoughts to themselves. Even Leonard and Virginia Woolf occasionally made antisemitic jibes about Kot, somehow forgetting the fact that Leonard was himself a highly assimilated Jew.

In the 1910s and 1920s, Kot worked as a translator of Tolstoy, Chekhov, Dostoevsky and other Russian writers for Hogarth Press, the small publishing outfit operated by the Woolfs. His translation of Maxim Gorky's Reminiscences of Leo Nicolayevitch Tolstoy was the first of their several great successes. He often shared the credit for translation with Virginia Woolf, Lawrence, Mansfield and other collaborators who knew not a word of Russian but were capable of rendering his adequate prose into exceptionally fine English. Ultimately, after quarreling with the Woolfs once too often, he left Hogarth to work for another publisher and eventually set up his own small press.

Kot once sought Lawrence's permission to translate Women in Love into Russian, but Lawrence declined when he realized that he was still an unknown quantity in Russia. In 1927, Kot asked to read Lawrence's latest manuscript, Lady Chatterley's Lover, with a view to publishing it himself, but Lawrence told him the novel was "so improper, you wouldn't dare to touch it." He added: "It's the most improper novel ever written: and as Jehovah you would probably find it sheer pornography."

A fervent proponent of honesty no matter how harsh, Kot later acknowledged that he had indeed found the book "disgusting." One of his favourite aphorisms was, "Better an honest slap than a false kiss." He was a fierce critic of literature he disliked, and he transformed people he disliked into lifelong enemies. Possessing a dark Russian temperament, he was also moody and went in and out of deep depressions.

Although Kot was a largely secular Jew, his English friends, unused to socializing with shtetl-born Jews, sometimes jokingly called him Jehovah or a rabbi or an Old Testament prophet, Dimant relates. Mansfield's husband, John Middleton Murry, wrote that he "looked like some Assyrian king… with an impressive hooked Semitic nose, a fine head of coarse, black, curly hair and massive features – very dark eyes with pince-nez."

Although not a household name like the more prominent figures of Bloomsbury, Kot definitely left his mark on the art world. Dimant asserts that Lawrence used him as a model for a character in his 1923 novel Kangaroo, and was once so taken with a snippet of biblical poetry that Kot sang for him that he made it the basis of his Utopian vision, Rananim. Kot also became a close friend of Mansfield and shaped her awareness of Chekhov; as well as of H. G. Wells, who asked him to tutor his son in conversational Russian, and of Mark Gertler, a young painter and fellow Jew from eastern Europe.

Despite all the social pressure to become Christian, Kot persisted in his Jewishness, and even glorified Jewish culture on occasion. When the Habima Players' famous production of S. Ansky's The Dybbuk came to London, Kot dragged Aldous Huxley and other influential friends to see it. When Lady Ottoline Morell, a friend whom he suspected was trying to convert him to Christianity, invited him to a service in St. Paul's Cathedral, Kot accepted.

"She thought he would be impressed by the beauty of the music and the Church of England service," a mutual friend, Lady Glenarvy, later wrote. "The only feeling he got from it was… [that] it was all so completely Jewish; every hymn and psalm and prayer or reading from the Bible was about Jehovah, Jerusalem, the Children of Israel, Zion and the Hebrew prophets."

Teen to cycle to NYC for Alzheimer's research

Michelle Bitran
Intern

For most people, just the drive from Toronto to New York would be an exhausting trip, but 19-year-old Benji Pister will be making the 800-kilometre journey by bicycle next month. It will take him six days.

Pister, who has just finished his first year of life sciences at McMaster University, will be making the bike tour in memory of his late grandfather, Paul. His goal is to raise awareness and money to find a cure for Alzheimer's disease. His grandfather suffered from Alzheimer's before his death four years ago.

"My grandfather was a very unique person. He was always happy, and he loved every single grandchild that he had," said Pister, who has named the trek the Paul Pister Ride for Alzheimer's Research.

As Pister's grandfather became more affected by Alzheimer's, which is usually marked by deterioration in memory, emotional health and cognitive skills, the family had to deal with the pain of his worsening mental state.

"It really was heartbreaking," Pister said. "It definitely affected me a lot."

Despite the fact that Alzheimer's disease affects many elderly people, funding for research is not nearly as abundant as it is for other causes, such as cancer research. Pister is determined to help change that.

"What I want to get out of this is just to motivate others to do more fundraising for Alzheimer's, and really, the end goal is to find a cure," he said. So far, he has raised about $2,500 for the Alzheimer Society's research program, exceeding his initial goal of $2,000.

"The donations kept coming in," Pister said, adding that after a slow start, friends and family began spreading the word of his upcoming bike journey and people have been eager to help.

Pister began taking a serious interest in cycling when he was about 15 years old. Last year, he rode in the 100-kilometre Zareinu Moveathon to raise money for children with physical and developmental disabilities.

Since making the decision to do a ride to New York about a year ago, Pister has been training to become a stronger cyclist. "I've been doing some major rides," he said. In addition to training on a stationary bike and working on his strength at the gym, he bikes to Hamilton and back each week to take a summer course at McMaster.

Pister has also altered his diet to include more protein and carbohydrates. He has virtually cut out junk food, finding that it slows him down in training.

It's important for Pister to focus on preparation, as the ride to New York will have him riding some 150 kilometres a day, he said.

Because Pister's own bike is not suitable for the intense ride, he will be using an aluminum road bike for the trip, lent to him by his friend Benjy Wexler. "Without that bike, I wouldn't be able to do what I'm doing now," he said.

Pister's father will be following him in a van, along with a friend who will be making a video documentary about the ride. The team plans to stop each night to rest and to make one stop each day until reaching New York.

Part of the reason for choosing the destination, Pister said, is because New York was one of his grandfather's favourite cities.

Although the training has been tough, and Pister will have a long road ahead of him when he begins the ride on Aug. 19, he is motivated by the importance of the cause. "I want people to take away that a disease like this can't be neglected," he said.

Benji Pister will be cycling from Toronto to New York on Aug. 19 to raise money for Alzheimer's research.

Pister hopes to make the ride an annual event so he can continue to raise money for the cause. "The training has been going great and the fundraising has been going great," he said. "I'm looking forward to the ride."

Benudiz named to Ontario Under-15 rugby team

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A year ago, Dylan Benudiz was unfamiliar with the finer points of competitive rugby. He was a hockey guy who didn't mind a little body contact, so when his buddy, Jake, suggested he might be suited for the rough and tumble aspects of rugby, Benudiz agreed to give it a try.

It turns out Jake was right: Benudiz, 14, was pretty good at the sport. He made the team at Bill Crothers Secondary School in Unionville, Ont., and helped the Colts win the York Region Athletic Association (YRAA) championship.

He played so well as a rookie that his coach suggested he try out for the provincial team. After surviving a number of tryouts, Benudiz was named one of 49 players selected to Ontario's Under-15 team.

Forty members of that group were chosen to travel this week to Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Quebec for a series of exhibition games.

Dylan Benudiz

"It's exciting," he said last week. "I never dreamed of this."

While in Quebec, the Under-15s will train with the Under-16 team, who are preparing to participate in the national championships. If Benudiz wants to play in a national event – and he does – it's something that will have to wait until next summer when he's older.

Though he's been at it only a year, Benudiz has fallen in love with the game. "Rugby is one of my favourite sports now," he said. "I enjoy how it's played and organized. When you're in the full game, you're not by yourself. You're with 14 other guys protecting you. They'll never leave you alone – they'll always try to support you."

Benudiz plays "hooker," the guy who wins the ball for his side during a scrum, when 16 bigger guys lock arms and push each other back and forth.

"I'm in the front row, where the main pushing is. I have to find the ball and hook it back to my teammates… You don't get as crushed as you might think."

At five foot eight, 150 pounds, mixing it up with the bigger guys might not be such a good idea. Better to stick with his own strengths, which are his quickness and his playmaking abilities.

"I'm sort of fast and can run to the ball faster and see the whole field," he said. He also rates his passing as pretty good and "I have good judgment for the scrums… I enjoy all aspects of the game. It's not all about contact – it's more about the teammates helping you and you helping your teammates to score."

Benudiz credits the coaching he received at Bill Crothers for helping his development, as well as training with the older boys at school.

He expects to continue to play for the school this year, but he's already planning for next summer, when he hopes to be a part of the Under-16 team and compete for Ontario at the national championships.

And he hasn't given up the hockey. He'll be back with the Vaughan Rangers this winter as well.

Israel has strict gun-control laws

Ben Sales

TEL AVIV — First-time visitors to Israel might be taken aback to see groups of armed teenagers walking through a city plaza on a weeknight, or surprised to walk into a public bathroom and see an M-16 lying across the sinks as a soldier washes his face.

But guns are ubiquitous in Israel, where most 18-year-olds are drafted into the army after high school.

However, once those soldiers finish their service two or three years later, they are subject to civilian gun-control regulations that are much stricter than American laws.

In fact, it's pretty much impossible for civilians who live in Israel to acquire an arsenal of weaponry of the sort used by the alleged shooter in last week's massacre in Aurora, Colo. James E. Holmes, who is accused of killing 12 people and wounding 58 in the Aurora movie theatre, legally bought the firearms he used, according to reports, including a semiautomatic rifle, a semiautomatic pistol and a 12-gauge shotgun. Leading up to the shooting, Holmes had bought thousands of bullets online.

In Israel, assault rifles are banned except for special circumstances, such as communal self-defence in areas deemed to be a security risk. And while political violence in Israel is all too common and gun violence is a growing problem, random shootings of strangers – like the Aurora massacre – are virtually unheard-of here.

Unlike in the United States, where the right to bear arms is guaranteed in the constitution's Second Amendment, Israel's department of public security considers gun ownership a privilege, not a right. Gun owners in Israel are limited to owning one pistol, and must undergo extensive mental and physical tests before they can receive a weapon, and gun owners are limited to 50 rounds of ammunition per year.

Not all Israelis, however, may own guns. In order to own a pistol, an Israeli must for two years have been either a captain in the army or a former lieutenant colonel. Israelis with an equivalent rank in other security organizations may also own a pistol.

In addition, residents of West Bank settlements and those who work there may own pistols for self-defence.

Other groups of Israelis, such as professional hunters and sharpshooters, or people transporting dangerous goods, may also own firearms. And Israelis may keep unloaded guns they inherited or received as gifts.

Lior Nedivi, a former police officer, said that despite Israel's militarized society, neither soldiers nor veterans engage in extensive gun violence because 18-year-olds are tested for mental and physical fitness before being drafted.

In 2008, 143 people in Israel died from firearms, according to the website gunpolicy.org.

"They [IDF] don't recruit everyone," said Nedivi, who runs a company called Advanced Forensic Science Services. "If you are a person with a record of violence, you will be discharged."

Nedivi favours allowing private gun ownership with tight regulations, noting that armed civilians have used their guns to stop terrorists during attacks.

He said that gun massacres don't occur in Israel because gun owners here undergo more comprehensive psychological screenings than do U.S. gun owners.

"It's not guns that kill, it's people that kill," Nedivi said. "If this person in Colorado will be screened now, they will say he has mental problems. In Israel, most people like this don't get a chance to get a gun."

Gun violence does still occur in Israel, though gun control is not a sensitive political issue.

"We think the society is over-armed," said Smadar Ben-Natan, a lawyer who co-heads Gun-Free Kitchen Tables, an Israeli coalition to end domestic gun violence. "There are too many weapons going around. There is no justification that these weapons go home and are present in civilian surroundings."

Rather than lobbying for new laws, Gun-Free Kitchen Tables is pushing for the enforcement of current regulations, which require security guards to leave their weapons in their workplace. Ben-Natan said private security companies often do not abide by the law.

"The private police companies offer an illusion of security," Ben-Natan said. "They're not accountable in terms of the public interest. They don't bear the cost of the precautions that need to be in place. The people that pay this price are the women and family members who get shot."

For soldiers who take their weapons home on weekends and off-nights, the rule is they must be on their person at all times or under double-locks if left at home.

Greek Jews protest new neo-Nazi 'rocker' lawmaker

JTA

ATHENS, Greece — The Greek Jewish community in a letter to political leaders and the country's president expressed its "revulsion" to the swearing-in of an antisemitic musician as a national lawmaker.

Artemios Mathaiopoulos of the neo-Nazi Golden Dawn party took the oath as a member of the Greek parliament on Wednesday. He replaces another member of the party who resigned.

"This composer of hate lyrics that praise Auschwitz offends the memory of the six million Jewish victims of Nazism – of whom 65,000 were Greek Jews – also offends thousands of their Christian fellow Greek citizens and vulgarly trivializes Jews and their sacred places, is now a member of the Greek parliament," said the letter from the Central Board of Jewish Communities in Greece sent last Thursday.

The Jewish community took particular exception to Mathaiopoulos, who was a bass player in a hard-rock Greek band called Pogrom, which has a "repertoire of fiercely racist, fascist, vulgar and antisemitic songs," the letter said, noting that a song titled Auschwitz, has lyrics like "f Anne Frank," "f the tribe of Abraham" and "piss on the Wailing Wall."

The letter asked President Karolos Papoulias to take "all necessary measures to keep those who extol Nazism out of the mainstream of our country's political and social life."

Golden Dawn, which features a Nazi swastika-like flag and has a Holocaust-denying leader, swept into parliament with 19 lawmakers in recent elections campaigning on an anti-austerity, anti-immigrant platform.

Novels inspire student's campaign to eradicate hunger

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

How much can a 20-year-old Torontonian learn from the Hunger Games trilogy?

Enough to start an international campaign to eradicate hunger and get her message heard by nearly 1,000 online supporters.

Guelph University student Lauren Morrison says the novels, written from the perspective of a 16-year-old female, inspire her because they remind her how lucky she is to live in a country like Canada.

The Hunger Games book and movie series, in contrast, is set in a post-apocalyptic world where food is scarce and children compete in a public battle for survival.

"The juxtaposition between our lives and their lives made the books so fascinating to read," she says.

"After reading, I knew I wanted to do something that was a tribute to the books' theme and show that fans can learn from the series and apply it to life."

Initially, Morrison just wanted to win tickets to the series' movie première, and started an online campaign to get tickets from TV talk-show host Ellen DeGeneres.

She created a Facebook page, "Get Lauren on Ellen for the Hunger Games," and quickly amassed more than 100 online supporters.

"After a week or two, I realized I could make something of this support and really make a difference."

She resolved to combine her love for Ellen, the Hunger Games, and community involvement and do something that incorporated all three.

Since the books featured a class system with mass starvation, she linked that theme to Toronto's own food struggles.

In June, she started a door-to-door campaign for food donations for her local food bank and encouraged supporters to do the same.

Morrison quickly decided to change her Facebook-organized mission so that it centred around food drives, and got 60 people to commit to collecting food themselves.

The issue of hunger was familiar to Morrison, who has volunteered at a school in Nairobi, Kenya.

"I got to see what it was like for people living in a place where they had nothing," she says.

"Children would ask us on a daily basis if we had a penny so they could get a piece of bread."

Going door to door in Toronto for two days, Morrison filled the back seat and trunk of a Ford Escape full of non-perishable food items and donated them to the North York Harvest Food Bank.

"We went door to door in the sun for five hours straight on a scorching hot weekend. People were really receptive to it," she recalls.

LAUREN MORRISON

"When I got to the food bank to deliver the food, I saw people lining up for hours in the blazing sun just to get a package."

Morrison says the summer is a particularly difficult time for food banks.

"The major times people are donating to food banks are on Thanksgiving, Christmas and Easter. So that takes care of fall, winter and spring, but there's really nothing in the summer to make people consider making donations," she says.

Her next drive is set to take place later this month.

"My overall goal is to be able to promote my campaign against hunger on the The Ellen DeGeneres Show," she says.

"I'm a huge fan of Ellen. I respect her. She stands for equality, kindness, respect and love, and is a really good role model to a lot of people. When I hear what she says and what she promotes, it's empowering."

She also hopes such an appearance could grow her campaign.

"I want it to be an international project. You sign up with a group of friends, and you go around door to door on the weekend of the event, on behalf of friends, and collect food for your local food bank," she says.

"There are people all over the world who love this book. I want to help more than just my local food bank. There are more people out there who are struggling, and the more people who can get involved, the fewer people will be hungry."

Aside from her charitable work, Morrison hopes to eventually become an interventional cardiologist.

"My father has had four heart attacks and a quintuple bypass. Many people would feel awful after something like that, but he's happy to be alive," she says.

"And on top of my father, I show symptoms of the disorder. So I want to help people in the future who have heart problems, because I think I could relate to my patients."

Asked what else she's reading, Morrison says her other favourite series is Harry Potter. But don't expect a Potterhead campaign too soon.

"It's hard to raise wizardry awareness," she jokes. "That would not go over so well in the community."

'We need to clean'

It's always on Thursday mornings. The horror. Even before I'm fully awake. I open my eyes and glance into Meir's gaze. I close them immediately. Then I hear his harsh voice: "Nina, we need to clean the house." Oh, boy.

You probably remember my issues with maids. Even though Meir swears on his poor life he, himself, threw away my precious shopping-bag collection, I know the last maid heartlessly stole it! Oh yeah, I saw her looking at my shopping bags with interest, especially the slightly torn bag from Holt Renfrew!

Anyhow, I've created a simple questionnaire for all of you, my friends, regarding our household cleaning situation.

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

1. Take a look at your bookshelf. What's on it?
(a) Only books, either organized in alphabetical order, by height or by interest.
(b) Mostly books.
(c) Newspapers, toys, keys, open envelopes, pens, brushes and some books.

2. Where do you put clothes you've just purchased?
(a) In the washing machine. Who knows who tried them on before me?
(b) I fold them carefully and put them in the closet.
(c) Stores wouldn't put them in such nice shopping bags for nothing, right?

3. How do you treat your carpets?
(a) Lovingly. In fact, I try to teach everybody to walk with legs wide open in the hall, so the carpet wouldn't fade in the middle.
(b) Vacuum weekly, call the professionals twice a year.
(c) I treat them with respect. They don't bother me, I don't bother them.

4. How do you feel about a sink full of dirty dishes?
(a) I have a rule: never go to bed unless the sink is empty. I simply wouldn't be able to sleep!
(b) I call one of my kids and we wash the dishes together, while telling funny stories. Very bonding.
(c) I call one of my kids, shove a $10 bill into his hand and tell him to make the dishes disappear.

5. How often do you dust?
(a) Daily. It's very important for your health.
(b) Once a week, during the regular cleaning routine.
(c) Never. Why bother? Experiments show it'll be dusty again in no time.

6. What's under your bed?
(a) A clean bright carpet, what else?
(b) The book I'm reading.
(c) Newspapers, toilet paper, empty plates and cans, hand lotion, half a chocolate bar.

Results:

If you answered mostly B, all in all, you're a nice person. You don't expect much of life, and it treats you just the same. Hmm.

If you answered mostly C, you're a vivacious, artsy soul, with real passion for life, yet no one understands you.

If you answered mostly A, you're a compulsive creature, you're probably friends with Meir, and I'm truly afraid of you!

Proposals about the day school tuition crunch

Joseph Adler

Guest Voice

The recent columns in the The CJN by Rabbi Jay Kelman and Abraham Foxman's regarding Jewish education in North America have prompted me to join the discussion. My wife and I have managed to incur the substantial cost of educating our children in the Jewish day school system in Toronto, and we are beginning to see the end of the enormous financial burden that this entails. We worry, however, for the financial wellbeing of our children and of other middle-class children and wonder how they'll fare in raising families in the future.

We do enjoy the benefits of living in a truly world-class city. And it may indeed be the case, as our community leadership constantly tells us, that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto allocates more funds to Jewish education than any other federation in North America. But this allocation does not mitigate or assuage the financial burden suffered by middle-class Jewish parents. Nor, more ominously, does it bode well for our collective future.

The status quo is simply unsustainable. Our community is in financial crisis. We can no longer rest on our laurels.

We must face the severe financial challenges with utmost dedication to resolving them. The cost of living as a Jew for most of the members of the community in the city of Toronto – with escalating housing, kosher food costs, tuition fees in excess of $60,000 of pre-tax income for a family of three, synagogue, camp, and other costs related to maintaining a Jewish way of life – is simply untenable. With increases in tuition alone of five per cent year after year, this issue will only worsen over time. We desperately need solutions now.

I wish, therefore, to suggest the following proposals regarding possible strategies to mitigate the enormous costs, all of which, in one form or another, have been proposed in the past by others.

First, parents of the day school system should be required, as a condition of enrolling their children, to leave five per cent of their estate to Jewish education and to buy insurance policies that are targeted to sustain the rising cost of Jewish education.

Second, our community day schools should adopt certain benchmarking practices to measure their performance against that of their peers, in order to identify cost-saving and revenue-enhancing opportunities. We need to take better advantage of our economies of scale across our day school system.

Third, we should not turn our backs on the pursuit of a political solution to persuade government to be fair and just. We are taxpayers and voters, too. Although it's clearly an unpopular position – as proven by its rejection in recent provincial elections – we cannot, as a community, afford to turn our backs on this issue.

Our politicians should continue to hear from us in an organized, coherent and vigorous fashion. Equity and the freedom of choosing the education most appropriate for our own children demand this from us. We need our community leaders to help us – our schools and our parents – organize this important effort.

I hope these proposals will generate some discussion and response within our community, from leaders and "ordinary" folk alike. We owe this to our children and our community.

When the space shuttle Endeavour finally lifts off on NASA's penultimate shuttle flight later this month, for many Israelis, it will symbolize the continuing journey of astronaut Ilan Ramon.

The Endeavour is tentatively scheduled to launch no earlier than May 16.

On a visit to Toronto last week, Asaf Agmon, CEO of Israel's Fisher Brothers Institute for Air & Space Strategic Studies – a non-profit organization that Israeli Ministry of Science and works with NASA to bring Israeli experiments into space – said the Endeavour mission will carry two Israeli bio-medical experiments into space, one of which is a "legacy project" from Ramon's Columbia mission.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Discover A New "Taste" at Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth

Toronto's favourite festival offers fun for the whole family

Welcome to GreekTown and the Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth

Welcome! Whether you live in GreekTown, work here, or visit, you're bound to enjoy its many dining and shopping opportunities. If you've attended the Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth in previous years, you've experienced the unbridled joy of Canada's largest street festival. We look forward to hosting you again this year.

We take great pride in our area. Its unique character and welcoming spirit are internationally known. We are particularly proud of our role in the Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth. We gratefully acknowledge the generous contributions of Pilaros Inc., our Title Sponsor, and all the other sponsors who help make this event possible.

On a personal note, I would also like to thank the members of our GreekTown BIA Board of Management for their tireless efforts throughout the year.

"From our GreekTown family to yours, welcome to the Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth. Enjoy!"

Constantine Voidonicolas
Chair, GreekTown BIA Board of Management, 2012

Toronto's favourite street festival has a whole new way to celebrate the fun and flavours of Greece and summer in the city. Every year in August, the city of Toronto flocks to GreekTown on the Danforth. Now celebrating its 19th year, the Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth is Canada's largest street festival, welcoming approximately 1.3 million visitors. A Decima Research poll reported that 90% of respondents identified "The Taste" as their favourite GTA festival event — beating out such iconic events as the Toronto International Film Festival, Caribana and Pride Week.

This year, as in 2009, 2010 and 2011, Pilaros International Trading Inc. is proud to be the Title Sponsor of the Taste of the Danforth. Pilaros is a leading importer of Mediterranean food products, primarily olives and olive oil — what the ancient Greeks referred to as "The Essence of Life".

Canada's largest street festival is a favourite event of GTA residents

The GTA has more than 200,000 residents of Greek ancestry, the third largest Hellenic community outside of Greece, and between 6 pm August 10th and 8 pm August 12th, everyone who comes to the Danforth gets to be Greek for the day. But there is much more than the celebration of the Danforth's Greek heritage at the festival.

As always, this year's Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth has loads of fun, family-friendly activities for your entertainment and enjoyment. For highlights refer to page B22; for a complete list of events, performers and showtimes, visit www.tasteofthedanforth.com.

But when you visit the Taste, you're not just having fun; you're also helping to save lives. To date this event has raised over $1 million in support of Toronto East General Hospital Foundation. How's that for a win-win?

Over $1 million raised in support of the Toronto East General Hospital

This past fall, the GreekTown On The Danforth BIA pledged an additional $250,000 towards the hospital's new Pediatric Clinic.

With singing, dancing and entertainment galore, the Taste has always had theatrical flair. This year, Alliance Films helps take it to a whole new level with their sponsorship of many themed events geared towards their upcoming releases The Paranorman, The Expendables 2, The Hunger Games, The Resident Evil: Retribution, and The Possession.

The Alliance themed events include the Paranorman Experience, The Expendables 2 Photo Opportunity and Stunt Show, The Hunger Games Archery Experience, The Resident Evil: Retribution Experience, and The Possession.
